Wed. CHRISTMAS v. GENERAL
BUILDING CONTRACTORS, LTD. [1952]
1 E.R. 39.

LONDON GRAVING DOCK CO., LTD. v. HORTON.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid), February 20, 21, 22, 26, May 9, 1951.]

Negligence—Invitee—Duty of occupier—Protection against “unusual danger”— Workman falling from staging—Workman’s knowledge that staging faulty.

In November and the first half of December, 1946, the plaintiff, a welder, was employed by sub-contractors to weld strips of steel on the ribs of a trawler which the defendants, the head contractors, were reconditioning. While working in the fish house (part of the hold), the welders had to work in pairs on a staging provided by the defendants and comprising four boards, five feet apart, supported on iron beams on angle-irons, placed across the fish house at a height of five feet, five inches, from the bottom of the trawler. There were no cross boards to the staging, and the only means of getting from one board to another was by stepping on an angle-iron. The staging was under the exclusive control of the defendants, and the sub-contractors’ workmen had no right to interfere with it, but they had complained of its insufficiency to the defendants’ charge-hand shipwright who had promised that something would be done to remedy the defect. Nothing, however, was done. On Dec. 16, while working on the staging, the plaintiff placed one foot on a plank and the other foot on an angle-iron to pass a tool-box to a fellow welder, and, while so engaged, he slipped and was injured. There was no contributory negligence on his part. In an action brought by him against the defendants, claiming damages for negligence, it was established that the accident was caused by the insufficiency of the staging.

HELD (LORD MACDERMOTT and LORD REID dissentiente): it was the defendants’ duty to provide reasonably safe premises or else show that the plaintiff had accepted the risk with full knowledge of the dangers involved; it was not necessary to show that he was volens as well as sciens, as the duty owed by an invitor to an invitee was not so high as that owed by an employer to an employee; the question whether the plaintiff undertook the risk of performing his task with full appreciation of the danger was a question of fact to be decided by the tribunal which tried the case, and, on the facts, the trial judge had ample evidence for his finding that the plaintiff had full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk which he ran; and, therefore, the defendants were freed from liability for damage occasioned by the insecurity of their premises.

Dictum of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (1866) (L.R. 1 C.P. 288), explained and applied.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL ([1950] 1 All E.R. 180), reversed.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, SINGLETON and JENKINS, L.JJ.), dated Dec. 21, 1949, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 180, allowing an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of LYNSEY, J., dated June 2, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 169, dismissing an action claiming damages for personal injuries arising out of the negligence of the appellants.

The respondent, a welder employed by sub-contractors, was injured while working on a staging erected by the appellants, the head contractors, in the hold of a vessel which the appellants were re-converting into a fishing trawler. The accident was due to the fact that the staging was defective in that it was insufficient. The respondent and his fellow workmen had complained of the insufficiency to the appellants' charge-hand, but nothing had been done to remedy it. LYNSEY, J., held that the appellants' duty to the respondent, as an invitee, was to prevent damage from an unusual danger, and, as the danger was known to the respondent, there was no unusual danger, and, therefore, the appellants were not liable in negligence. The respondent appealed and the Court of Appeal held that the danger created by the defective staging was unusual and that it did not become a usual danger merely because the respondent knew of it before his accident, and, therefore, the appellants were liable to him for their negligence. From this decision the appellants appealed.

Nelson, K.C., and Marven Everett for the appellants.

Edgedale, K.C., C. J. A. Doughty and J. C. J. Tatham for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

May 9. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal who awarded damages to Mr. Horton, the respondent, and set aside a judgment of LYNSEY, J., in favour of the appellants. The material facts are not in dispute and may be shortly stated as follows. The respondent was employed as a boilermaker and electric welder by Thames Welding Co., Ltd. By Dec. 16, 1946, he had been employed for at least a month in the fish hold of a trawler, known as the Valmont, of which the appellants were at all material times the occupiers. The respondent's employers had contracted with the appellants to weld metal strips into position on the sides of the hold, and it was the appellants' duty to provide, and they did in fact provide, the necessary staging for the respondent and other workmen to work on. The staging provided consisted of four boards, about twenty feet long, eleven inches wide, and three inches thick, laid fore and aft in the hold and resting on two thwartship angle-irons five feet five inches from the bottom of the hold and about three and a half inches by three inches in dimension. The boards were placed about five feet apart and each outside board was about eighteen inches from the side of the ship. The respondent, or any other welder who wanted to cross from one board to another, could only do so by stepping on to one of the angle-irons. The respondent and some of his fellow welders had made half-hearted complaints to the appellants' charge-hand shipwright about the insufficiency of the staging before Dec. 16, 1946, but, though some promises were made that he would see what could be done, no steps were taken to effect a change. On that date the respondent in the course of his duty was standing on the starboard centre deal and was engaged in handing a tool-box to another man on the starboard deal. For this purpose he placed one foot on to the angle-iron and transmitted it safely, but, as he was trying to get back, his foot slipped with the result that he fell astride the angle-iron and sustained injury.

In these circumstances the respondent maintained that the Court of Appeal were right in holding the appellants to be in fault and that he was entitled to recover the damages, which, if recoverable, had been agreed at £275. The claim was put in two ways. First, it was said that he was an invitee and the appellants had not exercised the degree of care required in such a case. Secondly, it was said that, on the principle laid down in Donoghue v. Stevenson (1), the appellants owed a duty to the respondent to take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions likely to injure him. Under the first heading, the duty towards an invitee was said to be to take reasonable care that the premises were safe, or, alternatively, if the duty was not so high, at any rate to establish that the danger was appreciated by the invitee and was freely undertaken by him with full knowledge of the risk which he was running and unconstrained by any feeling which would interfere with the freedom of his will. In other words, it must be shown that he was volens, within the meaning applied to that word in the phrase volenti non fit injuria, as interpreted by SCOTT, L.J., ([1944] 1 All E.R. 465) in Bowater v. Rowley Regis Corpn. (2). The appellants, on their part, contended that the duty of an invitor was of a lesser order than either of those claimed by the respondent. In their submission, they had fulfilled their duty if either they took reasonable care to make the premises safe or if the invitee had knowledge or notice of the danger.

My Lords, I have put the contentions on either side in a broad way because it is apparent that in one aspect the case demands a solution of the much discussed problem of the distance to which the burden imposed by the decision in Indermaur v. Dames (3) is to be carried and in what manner the dictum of WILLES, J. (L.R. 1 C.P. 288) is to be interpreted. If the respondent is right in saying that notice or knowledge is immaterial, that the invitor is under an obligation to use reasonable care to make the premises safe however manifest the risk may be, then, unless the appellants can show that the respondent was volens, they cannot escape liability. To this distance, at least, I understand SINGLETON, L.J., to have carried the doctrine in this case. The dispute has raged now for many years round the language of WILLES, J. (ibid.):

“... that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know...”

As was pointed out in argument and with truth, the words of WILLES, J., are not embedded in a statute, but they have been carefully chosen and often acted on, and they form the basis on which the duty of an invitor is established.

I am not conscious that it has been stated in plain terms, but it is noticeable that what is declared to be the duty is, not to prevent unusual danger, but to prevent damage from unusual danger. It is in this consideration, as I think, that notice or knowledge becomes important. Either may prevent damage, though the unusual danger admittedly exists. As I take this view, I find the question what is unusual danger of less importance than it might otherwise be considered. To my mind, danger may be unusual though fully recognised, and I am not prepared to accept the view that the word “unusual” is to be construed subjectively as meaning “unexpected” by the particular invitee concerned. Moreover,

I get little assistance from the alternative word "unexpected," suggested by PHILLIMORE, L.J. ([1915] 1 K.B. 596) in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4). I think "unusual" is used in an objective sense and means such danger as is not usually found in carrying out the task or fulfilling the function which the invitee has in hand, though what is unusual will, of course, vary with the reasons for which the invitee enters the premises. Indeed, I do not think that PHILLIMORE, L.J., in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4) is speaking of individuals as individuals, but of individuals as members of a type, e.g., that class of persons such as stevedores or seamen who are accustomed to negotiate the difficulties which their occupation presents. A tall chimney is not an unusual difficulty for a steeplejack, though it would be for a motor mechanic, but I do not think that a lofty chimney presents a danger less unusual for the last-named because he is particularly active or untroubled by dizziness. In the present case, undoubtedly, there was a danger of slipping owing to the wide spacing of the planks, and that danger is, in my opinion, accurately described as unusual. The existence of that factor, however, is not in itself enough to ensure the success of the respondent. Indeed, his advisers do not so contend. Contributory negligence on his part would destroy his claim and so, as I understand their concession, would a free and willing and unconstrained acceptance of the risk with full knowledge of its danger. It is in a consideration of this last concession, as I think, that the real contest lies. Contributory negligence may be disregarded. No act of the respondent could be so described.

The plea volenti non fit injuria does not appear in the defence, nor, as I explain hereafter, was it, in my opinion, necessary for the appellants to prove such facts as would warrant a finding to that effect, but, in any case, even if it was incumbent on the appellants to establish that the respondent undertook the risk willingly and without constraint, I do not think that a formal pleading to that effect was necessary. The protagonists are invitor and invitee and the former is entitled to set up by way of defence any circumstance which would enable him to escape liability at the suit of the latter. If notice or knowledge of the danger on the part of the invitee is enough, then the invitor can prove and rely on the existence of either or both. If, in order to succeed in that defence, the appellants must prove such facts as would establish a plea of volenti non fit injuria, then the appellants can cross-examine or call evidence to that effect, and, if this testimony is accepted, will escape liability, not because they have pleaded that the respondent was volens, but because they have established the fact that they have performed the obligations incumbent on inviters. SINGLETON, L.J., as I think, recognises this contention to be accurate, but holds that the respondent has not been shown to be volens, and TUCKER, L.J., finds that the evidence proves the respondent to have been sciens, but not volens. JENKINS, L.J., if I understand him rightly, goes further and takes the view that the appellants were under a duty to provide safe staging, and, if they did not do so, were liable in negligence.

I find it difficult to take any of these views. I accept the contention that an invitor's duty to an invitee is to provide reasonably safe premises or else show that the invitee accepted the risk with full knowledge of the dangers involved. If the parties were master and servant, it may well be that one should go further and say that a full appreciation of the risk is not enough, the servant must not be put in a position in which he is obliged either to obey orders or to run the risk of dismissal. To my mind, however, the position is different where the injured person is not a servant but an invitee. Admittedly, the duty of a master to his servant is higher than that of an invitor to his invitee. The invitor, as I see it, is not concerned with the position of the invitee vis-a-vis his own ultroneous master. So far as he is concerned, the invitee is an invitee and nothing more. I am content to accept the statement of SINGLETON, L.J., that the rule of law, as stated by WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (3), ends with the words "damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know." The duty, however, is not "to prevent damage," but to "use reasonable care" to prevent it, and it has to be determined what is reasonable care. This problem is dealt with in the latter part of the statement of WILLES, J., by which I understand him to mean: Even if there is unusual danger, the duty to use reasonable care to prevent damage may be performed by notice, lighting or guarding, and the recognition that the invitor may fulfil the obligations imposed on him by notice or lighting indicates that adequate warning to the invitee may be a compliance with the duty which is owed by the invitor. It is not, to my mind, an answer to say that the risk was there and the invitee returned to his work daily as the invitor knew. He did come back and continue his work, but, as the learned judge has found, he did so with full knowledge of the risk he ran. The real question is whether that fact is enough to exonerate the appellants or whether in the case of an invitee, as in that of an employee, it is incumbent to show, not only that the invitee knew and appreciated the danger, but also willingly undertook it. If so, the position of an invitee is on exactly the same footing as that of an employee, except for such special rights to compensation as are given to a workman under Acts dealing with the relation of master and servant. In my opinion, however, it is not the same, but is to be judged by a less exacting standard.

On the principle which I have asked your Lordships to accept, the question, therefore, is: Did the invitee undertake the risk of performing his task with full appreciation of the danger? This, as has been said more than once, is a question of fact for a jury to decide, if there be a jury. If not, it must be decided, like all other questions of fact, by the tribunal which tries the case—in the present instance by LYNSEY, J. At the end of his judgment that learned judge says ([1949] 2 All E.R. 171):

"If it were necessary to decide it I should have held on the facts of this case that [the respondent] did freely and voluntarily impliedly agree to accept the risk of working on the staging with full knowledge of the nature and the extent of the risk he ran."

He had, in my opinion, evidence on which he could reach the conclusion that the respondent had at least full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk which he ran and I do not feel justified in reversing this decision. Such a finding is, I think, a sufficient answer to a contention by an invitee that the invitor fell short of the standard of care which the law imposes on him. It is true that the staging was, and remained, unsafe, notwithstanding that complaints were made, and it is true also that the appellants did nothing to improve it, but the invitee has been held to have had full knowledge of his risk and such notice or knowledge is sufficient to exculpate the invitor, provided the full significance of the risk is recognised by the invitee.

I cannot myself find much assistance in the decided cases. The exact meaning of the words of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (3) and their true legal consequences have long been in dispute and for many years formed a basis of discussion by the text-book writers. The difference between sciens and volens has by now been firmly established, but where the exact line is to be drawn is a matter of more difficulty. The accurate demarcation, however, in my opinion, need not be laid down in the present case, since it is enough to protect the invitor from liability if he proves that the invitee knew and fully appreciated the risk. The further step that he must be shown not to have been under a feeling of constraint or, to put it otherwise, must have been volens is not an essential to the defence. Whether the learned judge meant to find that the respondent was volens I am not sure, nor am I sure that, if he had meant to do so, he had evidence which entitled him to reach that conclusion. As I have said, however, my view is that that question does not arise.

Before one considers the cases in which Indermaur v. Dames (3) was followed or discussed, it may be well to bear in mind that not every passing expression of a judge, however eminent, can be treated as an ex cathedra statement. It must be read in its context, and the most that can be expected is that it should be accurate enough for the matter in hand. Two illustrations may suffice and two expressions be contrasted. In R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (5) LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., said ([1929] A.C. 365):

"Towards such persons [i.e., invitees] the occupier has the duty of taking reasonable care that the premises are safe."

A In Cavalier v. Pope (6) LORD ATKINSON expressed the dictum ([1906] A.C. 432):

"... one of the essential facts necessary to bring a case within that principle [i.e., the principle of Indermaur v. Dames (3)] is that the injured person must not have had knowledge or notice of the existence of the danger through which he has suffered."

B The first was the case of a trespasser, and LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., was doing no more than setting out a rough differentiation between the duties owed to an invitee, a licensee and a trespasser. No accuracy or exactness of expression was required. In the latter, the duty of a landlord who had let a dilapidated house was under discussion. Except to point out that no question of invitor or invitee came in question, that relationship was immaterial to the point at issue. Even cases such as Brackley v. Midland Ry. Co. (7), where the statement of principle C was obiter since the danger was on a highway and not on private property, Griffiths v. Smith (8), where, again, the view expressed was obiter, and Wilson & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (9), which raised a question as to a safe system of working, must be regarded with caution. So, also, must cases dependent on contract, such as Osborne v. London & North Western Ry. Co. (10), or those dealing with the relationship of master and servant, such as Bowater v. Rowley Regis D Corpn. (2). None seems to me conclusive of the matter under discussion, and, though natural sympathy must make the inclination lean towards a desire to compensate the respondent for his injury, the true principle is, in my opinion, that a full appreciation of the danger on the part of the invitee and a continuance of his work with that knowledge are sufficient to free the invitor from liability for damage occasioned by the insecurity of the premises to which resort is made.

E The argument based on Donoghue v. Stevenson (1) can be more rapidly disposed of. The pursuer in that case had purchased from a middle-man a bottle of ginger beer into which a snail had crept, and was made ill by drinking the contents. She did not, however, sue the vendor, but proceeded against the original manufacturer, alleging that he ought to have contemplated that the ginger beer would in the ordinary course reach the lips of the pursuer without any intermediate examination and that he was negligent in not ensuring that the bottle had been kept clean before the ginger beer was inserted. Your Lordships' House held that, assuming the facts alleged to be true, the manufacturer would have escaped if it was natural to expect that the intermediate vendor would take care to see that the contents were in order. The pursuer, however, could recover from the manufacturer because such an examination was not to be expected. The law G required him to be careful not to run the risk of injuring a person whom he contemplated, or ought to have contemplated, as likely to be injured by his negligence, but an examination by the retail vendor, if rightly expected, could be relied on by the manufacturer and would have been a complete answer to the claim. Still more so would knowledge by the purchaser of the true position, whether such knowledge was actual or such as the circumstances would warrant H the manufacturer to assume. The defence did not have to show that the pursuer drank the contents with a full knowledge of the risk. It would have been enough if examination and consequent knowledge were to be expected. To that extent an argument based on Donoghue v. Stevenson (1) seems less forcible than the more obvious contention founded on the relationship of invitor and invitee. Neither ground, in my opinion, supports the conclusion that the appellants were in breach of their duty of care. I should allow the appeal with costs in your Lordships' House and below.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack that the appeal succeeds. It is unnecessary for me to repeat the facts which he has stated. The appeal was argued mainly on the duty owed in the particular circumstances of the case by an invitor to an invitee, and, in my opinion, the case properly falls within that category. For though the usual, and perhaps the original, example of an invitee is a person who comes on land or enters premises such as a shop or dwelling-house in pursuance of some business common to him and the occupier, there is no doubt that the respondent's counsel was right in saying that ships at a wharf or in dock have frequently been treated as "premises" and that there can be no real difference between the rights of persons entering a ship for the purpose of repairing it and those of persons entering a shop as customers.

In the well known and frequently cited passage in Indermaur v. Dames (3) (L.R. 1 C.P. 288) WILLES, J., stated the principle of the invitor's liability in tort:

"... [the invitee], using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know; and ... where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as matter of fact."

There are murmurs increasing with the passage of time against a clean cut division between invitees and licensees with a hard and fast delimitation of the duties owed to each category, but the exposition by WILLES, J., of the duty owed to invitees has been adopted in many subsequent cases and it has even been treated almost as if it were a section in a statute and as if all questions could be solved by construing and applying it. It is remarkable that, in spite of the great variety of circumstances to which it has been applied, criticism seems to have been confined to pointing out an ambiguity or uncertainty in application, the inevitable accompaniment of any condensed statement of a complex legal conception. Nevertheless, later decisions and judicial dicta have in some respects clarified the duties of the invitor, as I hope to show.

One problem, however, remains very much where WILLES, J., left it. The occupier has no duty to the invitee unless there is an unusual danger which he knew or ought to have known. But what is an unusual danger? It may not be unreasonable to suppose that WILLES, J., was aware that "unusual" is a word which might take a colour from the circumstances of the case, and that a definition of unusualness might hinder instead of helping a just solution of a specific problem and the rational development of the law. We were referred to the observation of PHILLIMORE, L.J., in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4). In that case a railway station yard was bounded by an unfenced bank. The plaintiff was in the habit of going himself or sending a driver with a horse and van to receive or deliver goods. On the occasion in question, the driver left the horse unattended while he was in the defendants' office signing for goods. The horse in his absence backed the van over the bank and damage resulted. It was held that the railway company's duty to the plaintiff was no higher than that of an occupier to an invitee and that there was no evidence of any breach of the duty to take reasonable care that the premises were safe for persons using them in the ordinary manner and with reasonable care. PHILLIMORE, L.J., said ([1915] 1 K.B. 596):

"I am not certain that a way to avoid misapprehension which might arise from the use of the words 'unusual danger'—which means, in my opinion, danger unusual for the particular person—might not be found by substituting the word 'unexpected' for 'unusual.' It is not a question whether the danger is unusual with regard to all the world, but whether it is unusual with regard to the individual complainant. In other words, in analysing the expression 'reasonably safe' one must take into account what is called in modern parlance the personal equation; what may not be safe for one person may be safe enough for the persons who frequent particular business premises. For instance, in loading a ship in a dock a gangway consisting of a plank without a handrail may safely be provided, though its narrowness or slope may be such that ordinary persons, not accustomed to ships, might not find it easy to use, because the stevedore and seamen who are to use it can use it safely. The gangway has to be safe for the class of persons who use it on business, and so far as any complainant is concerned it has to be reasonably safe for him. If it is safe for him, it does not matter whether or not it is safe for anybody else. It is for that reason that the element of knowledge comes in."

PICKFORD, L.J., expressed his agreement with these observations. I humbly confess that I find them more ambiguous and uncertain than the words they seek to explain. I do not find that the substitution of "unexpected" for "unusual" helps me much. The real difficulty, however, is that PHILLMORE, L.J., speaks with two voices, sometimes saying that the premises have to be safe for the class of persons who come on to them on business and sometimes that the danger is unusual if it is unusual for the particular individual. I think that there is a confusion between the condition which gives rise to the duty, the existence of an unusual danger, and the notice, or its equivalent, i.e., the knowledge of the individual invitee, which may be a discharge of the duty. I am of opinion that, if the persons invited to the premises are a particular class of tradesman, then the test is whether it is unusual danger for that class. Therefore, if the occupier supplies the sort of gangway which stevedores usually use, he has performed his duty so far as stevedores are concerned, and, if a particular stevedore suffers from a defective sense of balance and falls off the gangway, he cannot complain of the occupier's failure of duty. The sufferer knew the danger for him and he must accept the responsibility of using a gangway which might be dangerous for him because of his idiosyncrasy. A gangway, however, which is reasonably safe for stevedores and which is no unusual danger for them, may well be an unusual danger for another class of workman or for members of the public generally. So much for "unusual" in relation to persons. A danger, however, may also be "usual" or "unusual" in relation to the place. For example, a quay is dangerous though it is not in daylight an unusual danger for normal adults, but an uneven joint between two stones near the edge of the quay may be an unusual danger to anyone, and is none the less an unusual danger though it is not a concealed danger. I would not agree that a danger, which is unusual in either of the ways I have suggested, ceases to be an unusual danger because, through frequent visits to the place, it becomes familiar. In such a case another question will arise, whether in fact the invitee had sufficient notice, but the danger, in my opinion, remains an unusual danger. Though I think it is possible to discriminate in a concrete case between a danger which is unusual and one which is not unusual, no attempt to formulate a definition of unusualness appears to me to be likely to succeed.

In the present case LYNSKEY, J., held that an unusual danger means a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee, and that, if the invitee appreciates the existence on the premises of a danger and its nature and extent, it cannot be for him an unusual danger. He also held that the respondent had full knowledge of the nature and extent of the danger. In the Court of Appeal SINGLETON, L.J., held that the danger created by the staging was unusual because it was of a kind not usually encountered by welders engaged in the repair of a ship, and that it did not become a usual danger merely because the person suing knew of it before his accident. For the reasons which I have given, I agree with the Court of Appeal on this point.

The question then arises whether the appellants discharged the duty which they owed to the invitee in relation to this unusual danger. It is a duty of reasonable care for the safety of the invitee. For some time it appears to have been in doubt whether the duty of care could be discharged by warning or notice of the danger. It seems to me, however, that the point is settled by a series of decisions, of which Workington Harbour and Dock Board v. Towerfield (Owners) (11) is the latest, in which it has been held that harbour authorities or wharfingers, inviting ships of a certain size to enter the harbour or tie up at the wharf, owe to their owners the duty of an invitor to an invitee and that this duty is discharged by giving warning of dangers of which they knew or ought to have known. The cases are numerous and, in addition to The Towerfield (11), I will mention only R. v. Williams (12) and Anchor Line v. Dundee Harbour Trustees, The Circassia, Ellerman Lines v. Dundee Harbour Trustees, The City of Naples (13). In the last-mentioned case VISCOUNT HALDANE said (1922 S.C. (H.L.) 83) of ships entering the harbour of Dundee:

"Their legal position would thus be like that of the plaintiff in the well-known case of Indermaur v. Dames (3), and they would be entitled to look for the discharge of a duty resting on the respondents to exercise reasonable care to avert peril to them from any unusual danger of which the respondents knew or ought to have known. . . . On the other hand, those approaching with their vessels must, notwithstanding their right to rely on such care having been exercised, use care on their own part not to incur peril rashly."

In that case, the defenders were held liable because inter alia they failed to give warning of the position of a sunken wreck in the approaches to the harbour by means of properly disposed buoys. In the harbour and wharf cases, the duty of warning has arisen both in circumstances when the harbour authority or wharfinger had been guilty of negligence in allowing an obstruction to grow up on the bed of the harbour or at the wharf, or in failing to remove such an obstruction, and in cases where there had been no such prior negligence and the only breach of duty was the failure to warn. There is, however, no principle by which warning may be an appropriate discharge of the duty owed to invitees by a harbour authority but inappropriate in other cases. Judicial dicta in support of the view that warning is a discharge of the invitor's duty generally are not lacking and they are of high authority. Thus, in Cavalier v. Pope (6) LORD ATKINSON said ([1906] A.C. 432) of Indermaur v. Dames (3):

"... one of the essential facts necessary to bring a case within that principle is that the injured person must not have had knowledge or notice of the existence of the danger through which he has suffered. If he knows the danger and runs the risk he has no cause of action."

In Brackley v. Midland Ry. Co. (7) SWINFEN EADY, L.J., and BANKES, L.J., expressed the same opinion (85 L.J.K.B. 1606, 1608). So also did VISCOUNT MAUGHAM ([1941] 1 All E.R. 74) in Griffiths v. Smith (8).

When there is already knowledge, notice or warning will have no effect and the omission of it can do no harm. So, the defendant who has failed to give warning may yet succeed if he proves that the injured person had knowledge of the unusual danger. But whether it be knowledge gained without a warning or knowledge conveyed by a warning, it must be sufficient to avert the peril arising from the unusual danger. The knowledge must, therefore, be full knowledge of the nature and the extent of the danger. In the present case, the learned judge has found that the respondent had full knowledge of the nature and the extent of the peril, and the finding is beyond doubt warranted by the evidence which shows that the respondent had before his accident complained of the same defects in the staging as were proved at the trial. The real difficulty of the case is in the argument that, though a warning may sometimes be a discharge of the invitor's duty, for example, if it excludes a part of the premises from the area of the invitation, or if it is given to a person who has nothing to consider but his own safety and pleasure, it is not sufficient if the invitee is under a duty to his employer to work in the area of the danger. In such a case, it is said, the invitor must prove, not merely that the invitee knew of the danger, but that, knowing it, either he was himself negligent or he freely and voluntarily agreed to accept the risk. In the present case this argument is of vital importance, for the respondent was, under his contract of service, engaged on the repair of the ship and for that work the use of the defective staging was necessary. Contributory negligence was pleaded but not proved. The defence of volenti non fit injuria was not pleaded, and the appellants relied on the respondent's knowledge of the danger, not towards establishing the plea volenti non fit injuria, but as an equivalent to the discharge of their duty by warning. The issue between the parties may be stated in this way. The appellants say that, if the respondent incurred the risk sciens, he must fail, whereas the respondent says that he succeeds unless it is shown that he incurred the risk sciens et volens. On this issue I am not aware of any direct authority. In Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co. (14) the inviters argued that the defence volenti non fit injuria was established and it was held that it was not. If the appellants' argument in this appeal is sound, the defendants in Letang's case (14) assumed a greater onus than was necessary for their success. It is impossible to say what the result would have been if Letang's case (14) had been argued on the lines of the appellants' argument in this case. The solution must, therefore, be attempted on principle unaided by authority. The strength of the respondent's case is that the appellants knew that the welders were coming daily to their work and using the staging as their invitees, and that they were under a contract of service to do so. Yet the invitee's contract of service with his employer cannot be pleaded either by or against the invitor who is a stranger to it. Otherwise the invitor would owe to the invitee the same duty as an employer owes to his employees, and the invitee could sue with an equal prospect of success either his employer or an occupier of the premises who had erected staging thereon under a contract with his employer. Such a result would be just if the employer found liable in damages to his workman could in all circumstances recover the damages from the occupier, but counsel for the respondent recognised that the right of recovery might not be always available. The principle of avoiding circuity of action cannot be invoked, and to say that the invitor had agreed to perform the employer's duty to his employees is to resort to a fiction, and fiction is no longer an acceptable solution for the problems of industrial relationships. The sufferer must make up his mind whether to sue as an invitee or as an employee under his contract of service. He cannot, in my opinion, sue as an invitee and at the same time found on his contract of service as restricting his freedom to act on a warning of unusual danger given to him by the invitor.

SINGLETON, L.J., and, I think, JENKINS, L.J., also held that there was liability on the principles established in Donoghue v. Stevenson (1). My Lords, in Donoghue v. Stevenson (1) the question was whether a ginger beer manufacturer who had sold a bottle of ginger beer to a retailer was under any duty of care in manufacture to a consumer who was in no contractual relation with him. The argument for the defender was that there were certain relationships, such as physical proximity or contract, which alone give rise to duties in the law of quasi-delict or tort, and that the relationship between the pursuer and the defender was not one of them. The decision was that the categories of negligence are not closed and that duties of care are owed, not only to physical neighbours, but to anyone who is "my neighbour" in the wider sense, as stated by LORD ATKIN ([1932] A.C. 580), of a person

"... so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have [him] in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question."

This general proposition, however, left over the question whether, in the circumstances of the case, the consumer was so closely and directly affected by the manufacturer's act that the manufacturer owed him a duty of care. The answer, as LORD ATKIN said (ibid., 582), was that the manufacturer

"... puts up an article of food in a container which he knows will be opened by the actual consumer. There can be no inspection by any purchaser and no reasonable preliminary inspection by the consumer."

He was, therefore, liable though there was no contract between him and the consumer and though he had parted with the bottle so that there was no "physical proximity" through it between him and the consumer. The importance of the absence of any real opportunity for examination of the contents is emphasised in the speeches of LORD THANKERTON (ibid., 603) and LORD MACMILLAN (ibid., 615 and 622). In the present case, there is no need to seek out in Donoghue v. Stevenson (1) a reason for finding that the appellants owed a duty of care to the respondent. Admittedly, they owed that duty which an invitor owes to his invitee in respect of premises in the possession and control of the invitor. In any event, there was in the present case an opportunity for inspection, both by the respondent's employers and by the respondent himself, so that the respondent actually knew, as the result of his inspection, the very defects of which he now complains. Donoghue v. Stevenson (1) cannot, in my opinion, have any application to this case. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree with the opinions of the noble Lord on the Woolsack and my noble friend LORD NORMAND. The respondent, though a workman, was not employed by the appellants, and it is common ground that their relation was that of invitor and invitee and not master and servant. The duty of an invitor to an invitee is, in my opinion, to give him a fair warning of any danger on the premises which he cannot be expected to foresee. Premises inevitably contain a great variety of dangers, some great, some slight, some usual, some unusual, and it is, in my opinion, a question of fact whether the danger is so slight or so usual that no warning is needed, or so great or so unusual that the invitee, with the actual knowledge of the premises which he is known by the invitor to possess, ought, in the opinion of an ordinarily careful invitor, to be warned of it. The words of ATKIN, J., in Lucy v. Bawden (15) ([1914] 2 K.B. 326), approved by your Lordships' House ([1923] A.C. 81) in Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (16), appear to me directly applicable mutatis mutandis to the facts of the present case:

"The danger, if any, was patent to everyone, and the plaintiff gave evidence that she herself had complained to the defendant's agent about it."

The maxim volenti non fit injuria is a maxim which affords a defence to a person who has committed a breach of duty, but an invitor who invites someone on to his premises which are reasonably safe has committed no breach of duty, nor has he if the invitee knows the danger or has been adequately warned about it: see SALMOND ON THE LAW OF TORTS, 10th ed., p. 38. With the greatest respect to SINGLETON, L.J., I cannot agree with his statement ([1950] 1 All E.R. 184):

"A danger which is unusual does not become other than unusual merely because the person suing knew of it before his accident. If it were otherwise, notice of an unusual danger might of itself render the rule in Indermaur v. Dames (3) wholly inapplicable, whereas notice is only an element to be considered."

As I read the words of WILLES, J. (L.R. 1 C.P. 288) in Indermaur v. Dames (3), an occupier owes no duty to an invitee in respect of "usual" dangers, since the invitee is only entitled to expect that the invitor will take care to prevent damage from unusual danger, but "where there is evidence of neglect," i.e., where there is danger which may be found by the tribunal of fact to be unusual, it is a question of fact whether reasonable care has been taken by notice, lighting, guarding or otherwise, and, therefore, there has been no neglect.

LORD MACDERMOTT (read by LORD OAKSEY): My Lords, the facts have already been stated and there is no need for me to rehearse them at length. But it may help to define the issue for determination if I begin with a reference to the salient features of the situation which has produced it. The relationship between the appellants and the respondent was admittedly that of inviters and invitee, the respondent being employed as an electric welder on the appellants' premises by Thames Welding Co., Ltd. in the performance of certain work which that company had contracted with the appellants to carry out. The invitation, therefore, was not contractual and no question of any contractual duty, express or implied, arises. The premises of the appellants, so far as material to this appeal, consisted of a staging in the fish hold of the Valmont, a trawler which they were re-converting after war service. The appellants were the occupiers of the trawler and, as such, retained control of the staging throughout. They, acting by their shipwrights, had laid it and they alone were entitled to re-lay or alter it. At the time of his accident and for some weeks previously, the respondent had to use this staging in the discharge of his duties as a welder. In point of fact, it afforded an inadequate footing for welders and must be regarded as continuously dangerous while the respondent was working on it. In the Court of Appeal SINGLETON, L.J., said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 182):

"In the condition in which it was, the staging was defective, in that it was insufficient. There is no doubt as to that. It could have been made satisfactory by the use of more deals, e.g., by the use of a couple of cross boards. As it was, it constituted a danger which led to an accident to the [respondent]."

That view was not challenged before your Lordships, nor was it suggested that the respondent had not taken due care for his own safety. Contributory negligence was, indeed, alleged in the defence, but LYNSKEY, J., did not deal with the plea and the evidence is insufficient to support it. It is also clear that the appellants must be taken to have known, through their servants, of the defective and dangerous condition of the staging and, further, that it could have been made reasonably safe and suitable for its purpose by the exercise of reasonable care on their part. This was not in dispute. As will be seen, the point which emerges respecting reasonable care is not whether the appellants in fact took such care, but whether, in the circumstances, they were under a duty to the respondent to do so. Two other matters must be mentioned to complete this summary and define the principal issue. First, the respondent was aware of the dangerous state of the staging and of the risk he ran in using it. And, secondly, he cannot, despite his knowledge, be taken as having freely and voluntarily agreed to accept that risk. Though volenti non fit injuria was not pleaded, LYNSKEY, J., indicates in one passage in his judgment ([1949] 2 All E.R. 171) that, had it been necessary, he would have found against the respondent on this defence, and, thus encouraged, the appellants appear to have relied on it to some extent in the Court of Appeal. At the Bar of this House, however, volenti as a defence was expressly disavowed. In truth, the appellants could not well have done otherwise. It is settled law that, even in cases of accidental harm, knowledge of a risk does not necessarily import a willingness to bear it without compensation, and here the evidence which, for good reason, was not directed to this plea, comes nowhere near sustaining it.

Stated in general terms, the question, then, is whether an invitor can be held liable in tort for injury caused by the dangerous state of his premises, of which he knew or ought to have known, to an invitee who, though sciens, was neither volens nor careless for his own safety. For the appellants it was contended that this question was governed by Indermaur v. Dames (3), and that, when properly understood, the law there laid down required that it should be answered in the negative. The essence of Indermaur v. Dames (3) lies in the well-known passage in the judgment of WILLES, J., in the Court of Exchequer in which he states the rights of the invitee. The passage is so directly in point that I must set it out even at the risk of being repetitive. It runs thus (L.R. 1 C.P. 288):

"... with respect to such a visitor at least, we consider it settled law, that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know; and that, where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as a matter of fact."

This statement of the law was affirmed by the Exchequer Chamber and has long been regarded as an authoritative exposition of the duty owed by an invitor to his invitee. But for some time its meaning in one particular respect has been considered ambiguous by text writers and judges, and it is this ambiguity that your Lordships are now asked to resolve. The matter cannot, of course, be settled merely by treating the ipsissima verba of WILLES, J., as though they were part of an Act of Parliament and applying the rules of interpretation appropriate thereto. This is not to detract from the great weight to be given to the language actually used by that most distinguished judge, but the inquiry is to ascertain the applicable rule of the common law and cannot, as I regard the position, be confined to a problem of construction. There is, however, no doubt as to the substance of the point which has arisen, whatever the apt way of describing it may be. It involves a choice between two views which, put briefly and in relation to the general question as I have stated it above, may be expressed thus: (i) the invitor owes no duty to an invitee who has knowledge or due notice of the relevant danger; and (ii) the invitor's duty is to take reasonable care to protect his invitee from the relevant danger.

It will be convenient to discuss these views and their implications in turn, but before doing so I think it well to mention one or two general considerations which it may prove helpful to keep in mind. The first is that the range of circumstance affecting the relationship of invitor and invitee is virtually infinite and generalisations based on some particular state of affairs must be advanced and regarded with caution. The next is that matters pertaining to this or that ground of defence may, in this field, readily lead to confusion in ascertaining the true character of the duty involved. For example, knowledge on the part of an invitee may contribute to the defeat of his claim in a variety of ways, as by showing that he was volens, or careless for his own safety, or, in some circumstances, that his invitor had in fact taken reasonable care for his protection, but it does not follow in any of these cases that such knowledge, if standing quite alone, would have been sufficient to absolve the invitor. It is one thing to say that an invitee's claim has failed in consequence of his knowledge and, as it seems to me, quite a different thing to say that because he had knowledge his invitor had no duty towards him. And lastly, the authorities cited by either side appear to offer no instance in which the present point was raised, debated and decided. In most of them the dicta relied on, now supporting one view and now the other, are obiter and, no doubt for that reason, expressed on occasion perhaps less precisely than would otherwise have been the case. I shall refer to some of these decisions later, but I do not think it necessary to examine them all. Having given them my careful attention, I cannot but feel that the outcome of the present appeal must ultimately rest on principle rather than precedent.

Of the views propounded for your Lordships' consideration, that which I have stated first was the whole basis of the appellants' case. Their submission accepted Indermaur v. Dames (3) as containing a complete statement of the applicable law and depended largely on the meaning to be attached to the use by WILLES, J., of the expression "unusual danger." Now there can, I think, be little doubt that that expression was intended to exclude the common, recognisable dangers of every day experience inherent in premises of an ordinary type, such as the danger of working on a factory chimney or at the edge of a reasonably lit wharf. But it was not suggested that the staging in this case constituted a common or usual danger of that sort. What the appellants said was that the expression "unusual danger" also connoted a danger which, from the point of view of the particular invitee, was unexpected and, therefore, unknown to him. At the trial LYNSEY, J., acceded to this contention and the heart of his judgment dismissing the claim may be found in one sentence in which he says ([1949] 2 All E.R. 171):

"... if an invitee does appreciate the existence on the premises to which he is invited of a danger and its nature and extent, it cannot be to him an unusual danger."

In other words, an invitee with full knowledge of the danger that causes him harm is owed no duty by his invitor and is, therefore, without remedy against him, whatever the circumstances. I must say that reasoning seems to me to rest on a very narrow ledge and to lay undue stress on the import of a single word in a judgment which, however outstanding, was certainly never intended to take its place in the statute book. But I find it also unsatisfactory on several broader grounds and these I shall now mention before referring to authority.

It may be that in speaking of unusual danger WILLES, J., had in mind what was unusual for the particular invitee. That was the view of PHILLIMORE, L.J. ([1915] 1 K.B. 596), in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4), and, if I may say so, there is much to be said for it, provided it is not used to tax the invitor with liability for the consequences of some idiosyncrasy on the part of the invitee of which the invitor was ignorant and ought not to have known. But I find difficulty in taking the next step and saying that a danger cannot be unusual for the particular invitee if it is known to him. Why should this be, unless "unusual" is given a special and restricted meaning? A man working, for example, on a platform supported by a frayed rope, or at the unloading of a ship on fire, would surely never think of describing his danger as usual no matter how well he appreciated the risk. Had the hole down which the plaintiff fell in Indermaur v. Dames (3) been in the immediate neighbourhood of his work, so as to constitute a continuing and obvious danger while he was doing his job with all due care, I venture to think that no one would have been more surprised than WILLES, J., himself to learn that on the law as he stated it the danger was not unusual and no question of reasonable care on the part of the invitor could possibly arise. It seems to me that the view propounded by the appellants can only be placed on a logical basis if in this particular branch of the law sciens can be said to come to the same thing as volens. But there is nothing in Indermaur v. Dames (3) to justify any such disregard of a distinction long recognised in English law and, perhaps, nowhere more clearly drawn than in the sphere of industrial relations. In Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co. (14) the distinction was regarded by the Judicial Committee as material in determining the rights of an invitee and the correctness of that view is not, in my opinion, now open to doubt.

This last consideration leads to a further difficulty I have regarding the appellants' contention. If the invitee sciens is not necessarily volens as well, then, as I see it, the whole virtue of giving him notice of the danger, the whole relevance of knowledge on his part, must lie in his being in a position to keep clear of the danger once he knows of it. Now it may well be that the fact that the present issue has emerged for decision so long after Indermaur v. Dames (3) can be accounted for by saying that in most cases of invitor and invitee the danger is, as it was there, avoidable from the point of view of an informed and reasonably careful invitee. In instances of that sort, knowledge could be decisive without the necessity of choosing between the views propounded at your Lordships' Bar. But how can knowledge rank as a decisive criterion of responsibility—and that is what the appellants' contention amounts to—where, as here, the danger is constant and inescapable for the invitee, despite his knowledge, while he remains on the premises pursuant to his invitation? In such circumstances, I find it difficult to discern any sound reason why knowledge per se on the part of the invitee should exonerate the invitor who is content to leave unabated, on the premises he controls, an abatable danger. On this ground the test of liability advocated by the appellants ought not, in my opinion, to be read into Indermaur v. Dames (3) if, as they have urged throughout, that decision states the whole duty of the invitor and is applicable irrespective of whether or not the invitee's knowledge can avert the peril.

The appellants' proposition must also be considered with reference to the ambit of the relationship of invitor and invitee. The weight of authority favours the view that for the purposes of the law of tort—I do not refer to contractual obligations—the liability of an occupier to one who visits his premises must be determined according to whether the visitor is a trespasser, licensee or invitee. There is no fourth category conferring rights superior to those of an invitee for the accommodation of persons who, as members of the public, resort to the premises as of right—e.g., intending passengers entering a railway station: see Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4); the observations of LORD HAILSHAM, L.C. ([1929] A.C. 364), and VISCOUNT DUNEDIN (ibid., 371) in R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (5); and, for a more recent instance, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Sutton v. Bootle Corpn. (17), per ASQUITH, L.J. ([1947] 1 All E.R. 96). I think this view must now be accepted as good law. Counsel for the appellants, indeed, did not seek to argue the contrary, but he was constrained to admit that the result, if his main contention were sound, would be to produce an anomalous situation in certain events. I may illustrate this by an instance mentioned in the course of the debate. A, at the end of his day's work, repairs to the local railway station to get home. He goes to the ticket office by the usual and only means of approach. The roof overhead is in a dangerous state and bits of it are liable to fall at any moment. The railway company know of this and could readily avert the danger for those beneath by placing a temporary screen under the defective part. But all they do is to post a notice describing the danger in clear terms. A reads and understands this before he enters the perilous area, but hurries on to get his ticket and is hurt by a piece of falling glass. He was not volens or careless. Yet, if the appellants are right, he was owed no duty by the company and has no redress. My Lords, if the law confers that sort of immunity on occupiers of premises, it is, to my mind, inadequate and open to grave criticism. I do not forget the unwisdom of building principles on hard and rare instances. But I do not think the illustration I have given is fanciful or remote from the run of ordinary affairs except, perhaps, in this, that there must be many responsible occupiers who, in such circumstances, would feel they had done wrong if they had not done more. In applying the common law to a given state of facts on which there is no binding authority, it is permissible and proper, in choosing between two possible views, to have regard to the reasonable requirements of the community which the law has to serve. Such a process demands great caution and is not necessarily conclusive. But if one view leads to a narrow and unreasonable rule and the other does not, it is a point in favour of the latter. The matter to which I have been referring is, therefore, in my opinion, one to be taken account of in weighing the appellants' case. Without being decisive, it appears to me to bear against it.

The same may, I think, be said of another consideration to which I will now refer. In the Court of Appeal SINGLETON, L.J., held for the respondent on two grounds. He first rejected the view of Indermaur v. Dames (3) propounded by the appellants and found them in breach of the duty laid on inviters by that decision, and, secondly, he was of opinion, on the strength of the general principles enunciated by SIR WILLIAM BRETT, M.R., in Heaven v. Pender (18) and by LORD ATKIN in Donoghue v. Stevenson (1), that the present appellants were under a duty to use ordinary skill and care in the provision of the staging. It is no doubt true that, on occasion, responsibility at law may be imposed concurrently by different rules, as, for example, where the claim sounds in both negligence and nuisance. But I am not disposed to think that the liability in tort of an invitor to his invitee comes from more than one quarter. I think that where there is such liability it must be found in the doctrine of Indermaur v. Dames (3). That, however, is not to say that the broad concept of neighbourly duty exemplified by Heaven v. Pender (18) and Donoghue v. Stevenson (1) is entirely irrelevant to the present investigation. The question, as I see it, is whether Indermaur v. Dames (3) also exemplifies that concept. If the respondent is right, it does, for the duty then lies entirely in the taking of reasonable care. On the other hand, the position, as it seems to me, is essentially different if the appellants are right. It is correct to say that they do not deny the need for some initial care. The invitor's liability being in respect of danger of which "he knows or ought to know," he is, at least, under an obligation to use reasonable care to make himself aware of defects that may injure his invitee. But that done, he may, according to the appellants, discharge his obligation—or, perhaps, I should say end it—merely by giving the invitee due notice of the danger—and even that is unnecessary if the invitee is already aware of it. That might possibly be regarded as a rational form of obligation if sciens had to be treated as the equivalent of volens in this sphere. But otherwise it seems strange and unsuited to the relationship concerned, which, when all is said, remains based on common interest; almost as strange, indeed, as would the duty of a motorist become if, having seen the pedestrian in his path and given him the loudest of warnings, he was then absolved from taking any further step to avoid a collision. All this, of course, is itself inconclusive. Our judicial process cannot eliminate what is obsolete and unsatisfactory once it has become established law—as witness the recent abolition by statute of the doctrine of common employment after much judicial denunciation. But the question here is open. Your Lordships' decision will establish what was not established before and that, as it seems to me, makes a comparison between the broad merits of the rival contentions both relevant and right.

I come now to authority. For the reasons already mentioned, I confine myself to the cases that lend, or appear to lend, most support to the appellants' submission. Pride of place must go to certain statements made in the Court of Appeal in Brackley v. Midland Ry. Co. (7). BANKES, L.J., said (85 L.J.K.B. 1608):

"I am prepared to deal with this case upon the assumption, without deciding it, that there was an invitation by the railway company to this particular plaintiff to use this footbridge as an access to the platform to which she desired to go. Now, in those circumstances, what was the duty of the railway company to the plaintiff? A great many expressions have been used in different cases with regard to that duty; but I think that the duty was expressed in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4) and in Cavalier v. Pope (6) in the best and the simplest way—that is, that the duty which arises out of the relationship of an invitor and an invitee is a duty in respect of any danger which was known to the defendants, or ought to have been known to the defendants, and of which the plaintiff had either no knowledge or notice. If that is a correct statement of the law, it follows that in any case, when the proper conclusion upon the evidence is either that the defendants did not know or ought not to have known the danger, or that the plaintiff did know or had notice of the danger, the defendants' duty is not established; and the duty not being established, no question can arise of any breach of their duty, and no question will arise as to any necessity for a defence on the part of the defendants arising out of contributory negligence or otherwise."

SWINFEN EADY, L.J., spoke to the same effect and I think PHILLIMORE, L.J., agreed, though he said little on this aspect of the matter. The view thus stated was obiter, but, as expressed, it entirely upholds the appellants' submission and cannot be lightly disregarded. In my opinion, however, there is good ground for saying that it was not an accurate exposition of the law. On the supposition that the plaintiff was their invitee, the company in that case had contended throughout that she was volens and, as I read the report, it seems that both SWINFEN EADY, L.J., and PHILLIMORE, L.J., were prepared (on this supposition) to hold her so, for they were at pains to distinguish Osborne v. London and North Western Ry. Co. (10). When one studies the arguments and judgments in Brackley's case (7), it is, I think, reasonable to suppose that BANKES, L.J., was not, in the passage from his judgment which I have quoted, directing his mind to the important distinction between knowledge simpliciter and the knowledge which in special circumstances may found a plea of volenti non fit injuria. This view is fortified by the reliance placed by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., and BANKES, L.J., on Cavalier v. Pope (6). The only relevant passage in the opinions delivered in Cavalier v. Pope (6) is to be found in the speech of LORD ATKINSON who, on referring to the principle of Indermaur v. Dames (3), says ([1906] A.C. 432):

"... one of the essential facts necessary to bring a case within that principle is that the injured person must not have had knowledge or notice of the existence of the danger through which he has suffered. If he knows of the danger and runs the risk he has no cause of action."

I see no ground for thinking that the Court of Appeal in Brackley's case (7) intended to put the test any higher than it was put by LORD ATKINSON in Cavalier v. Pope (6). But the last sentence of this passage which, it may be observed, was quoted fully by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., marks the distinction to which I have just referred by the significant words "and runs the risk." I cannot accept the view that LORD ATKINSON meant that an invitee sciens was necessarily in the same position as an invitee volens, and, if that be so, I do not think there is anything in Brackley's case (7) to sustain the appellants' case.

I must also refer to Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (16). It was there decided that the plaintiff was a licensee, not an invitee, but such relevance as this case has lies not in what it decided but in the inference to be drawn from certain observations made by LORD ATKINSON and LORD SUMNER to the effect that even as an invitee the plaintiff could not have recovered. What LORD ATKINSON said ([1923] A.C. 86) concerning the plaintiff was this:

"The findings of fact of the learned judge who tried the case, SHEARMAN, J., disentitled her, in my view, to any relief either in the character of licensee or in that of invitee of the defendants."

LORD SUMNER also considered that the findings of SHEARMAN, J., should be accepted, and then, after stating his opinion that the claimant was a licensee, he added (ibid., 92):

"In this particular case, however, it makes no difference to the liability whether she was the defendants' licensee or their invitee. Under the present circumstances the obligation was only not to lay a trap for her, and none was laid."

The defect which caused the plaintiff, Lilian Fairman, to fall down the stairs was found to be obvious and such as could have been seen by her had she looked, and the suggestion based on the excerpts I have cited was, as I understand it, that they indicated acceptance of the proposition that an invitor owed no duty to an invitee who knew or ought to have known of the danger or defect in question. I consider this suggestion ill-founded. Apart altogether from the obiter nature of the remarks quoted and the fact that the precise point with which your Lordships have now to deal was not raised in Fairman's case (16), I do not think that either LORD ATKINSON or LORD SUMNER intended to assert any such general proposition. The findings to which LORD ATKINSON referred included findings to the effect—and here I quote LORD ATKINSON'S own words (ibid., 87)—

“That there was no negligence on the part of the landlord or of the caretaker in not observing the condition of the stairs, reporting it and getting them repaired.”

—and again (ibid., 88), that the trial judge did not “... think he could possibly find that the staircase as a whole or that this particular place could be described in plain English as dangerous.”

It may be that this latter finding must be linked with the view that the claimant failed to see the obvious and was, therefore, the author of her own misfortune. But whether that be so or not, the other finding meant that the occupier did not know and ought not to have known of the defect, and on that ground alone the claim of an invitee was bound to fail. The part stressed in what LORD SUMNER said was, of course, the phrase (ibid., 92): “the obligation was only not to lay a trap for her.” Even if these words are to be isolated from their context, I would be slow to conclude that LORD SUMNER intended to confine the rule in Indermaur v. Dames (3) to an obligation not to lay traps for invitees, irrespective of the circumstances and of whether the danger was avoidable or not. But, in fact, LORD SUMNER was careful not to make any such sweeping statement. The immediately preceding words, “Under the present circumstances” were clearly meant to have a limiting effect. I confess the findings of fact in Fairman's case (16) cause me some difficulty, and, for that reason, I am not entirely clear as to what exactly LORD SUMNER intended to include in “the present circumstances,” but I think he must, at least, have had in mind the plaintiff's familiarity with the stairs, that they were well lighted and their condition was plain to be seen, and, also—and this I think was implicit throughout the case—that the kind of defect which had appeared was easily avoidable by people using the stairs. For these reasons I am unable to find support for the appellants' contention in Fairman's case (16).

The appellants also relied on certain observations of VISCOUNT MAUGHAM in Griffiths v. Smith (8). In that case the appellant, Mrs. Griffiths, had accepted an invitation by the managers of the school attended by her son to an exhibition on the first floor of the school premises. The floor was in a dangerous condition and collapsed during the display, causing Mrs. Griffiths serious injuries. The material part of VISCOUNT MAUGHAM'S speech reads thus ([1941] 1 All E.R. 74):

“The appellant had to show that the managers were in occupation and control of the premises, and were, therefore, under a common law duty to the invitee to take reasonable care to prevent injury to the latter from a hidden danger of which, as occupiers, they should have been aware, or to warn the invitee of the existence of the danger. Thus the claim is simply on the well-known principle of Indermaur v. Dames (3).”

It is to be noted that the managers did not contest the finding that they had failed in their duty to the appellant. The only issue was whether they were protected by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. As well as being obiter, the passage quoted cannot, therefore, be regarded as having been directed in any way to the question which your Lordships have here to consider. In the circumstances, I am in some doubt whether it can reasonably be taken as indicating more than that, in the particular instance, the managers might have discharged their duty either by removing the danger or by giving warning of it, and that is very far from saying that, in any event and to any invitee, warning is always enough. If, however, the passage is to be read as stating the substance of the rule in Indermaur v. Dames (3) it would lend support to the appellants' contention, for, so read, it limits the rule to hidden dangers, and dangers cease to be hidden when by warning or otherwise they become known. But if that is what VISCOUNT MAUGHAM meant, I am, with great respect, unable to agree. Had WILLES, J., intended to confine the liability of inviters to hidden dangers, it may, I think, be presumed that he would have said so, and certainly that he would not have employed the word "unusual" for the purpose. Further, the terms he chose to use, particularly with regard to what he described (L.R. 1 C.P. 288) as seem to me to suggest that he would have been content in appropriate cases to leave it to a jury to find as a matter of fact whether the giving of notice amounted to the taking of reasonable care. That view, resting as it does on the text of the judgment, ought not to exclude other considerations, but, if well founded, it reaches beyond the immediate point towards the heart of the controversy, for it means, not only that WILLES, J., had more in mind than dangers which are hidden (and which, therefore, pass out of that category when revealed), but that the ultimate test he considered applicable to all cases within the rule was one of reasonable care.

I turn next to the view advanced by the respondent. Is the invitor's duty one of taking reasonable care to protect his invitee from the relevant danger while the invitation subsists and the invitee is on the premises? This view also finds support in various dicta, usually obiter, to be found in the reports. Thus, in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4), BRAY, J., said ([1914] 2 K.B. 163):

"... it was at least a duty to take reasonable care that their premises were reasonably safe for persons using them in the ordinary and customary manner and with reasonable care."

This passage was approved in the Court of Appeal by BUCKLEY, L.J., who added ([1915] 1 K.B. 594):

"That statement of the duty is, I think, correct, and it is not a larger duty than that in Indermaur v. Dames (3)."

In R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (5), LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., said ([1929] A.C. 364):

"The highest duty exists towards those persons who ... are present by the invitation of the occupier. Towards such persons the occupier has the duty of taking reasonable care that the premises are safe."

In Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (19), GODDARD, L.J., said ([1941] 3 All E.R. 181):

"Towards an invitee the occupier has the duty of taking care that the premises are reasonably safe."

In Woodward v. Mayor of Hastings (20), DU PARCQ, L.J., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 566):

"Their duty to the invitee was to use reasonable care to prevent damage which they knew or ought to have known."

In Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co. (14) LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE, delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, said ([1926] A.C. 732) that the defendant company, having invited the injured person to use the access in question, "were accordingly bound to keep it reasonably safe." That statement certainly was not obiter for, once the defences of volenti and contributory negligence had been disposed of, the appeal turned on it. But, though the injured person there must have been sciens to some extent, the present issue was not in debate. Letang's case (14), therefore, while more directly in point than the other cases to which I have just referred, cannot be regarded as a coercive authority on this aspect. Its prime importance in this appeal lies in the distinction it emphasises between sciens and volens.

My Lords, it will be observed that the view for which the respondent contends has not always been precisely echoed in the supporting dicta of which I have given examples. And I think that, in so far as the duty of the invitor has been described as a duty to take reasonable care that his premises are reasonably safe, it has been put too high to be accurate as a general proposition, even if the respondent is right. No doubt, on his submission, the duty falling on the invitor would, on occasion, be properly so described. But occupiers would be placed in an intolerable position if on all occasions their obligation to invitees was of that nature and they had to make their actual premises reasonably safe, irrespective of whether due and timely warning or other precaution might suffice to avert the danger. I think it is clear from the terms in which WILLES, J., spoke in Indermaur v. Dames (3) that, if the respondent is correct in the substance of his contention, the duty of an invitor, stated generally, is to take reasonable care to prevent damage to his invitee from the relevant danger—and that does not necessarily and invariably mean making the premises reasonably safe.

It remains to choose between these conflicting views. In my opinion, that propounded by the respondent is to be preferred. It accords better, as it seems to me, with the language employed by WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (3), including his use of the expression “unusual danger.” It respects the settled distinction between sciens and volens in this branch of our jurisprudence, a distinction which the appellants’ contention would, in effect, obliterate. It provides a rational criterion of responsibility over a wider range of circumstance, being equally applicable to avoidable and unavoidable dangers and to invitees of all kinds and degrees. And, not least, though in a sense this is but to enlarge on what I have just said, it applies to a relationship which, as already observed, is infinitely varied in character, a test of liability which is correspondingly flexible and adaptable. For what is reasonable in any given case must depend on all the relevant circumstances, including such factors as the nature of the invitation, the nature of the danger, the knowledge of the invitee, and the practicability of the possible means of removing or reducing the risk. So, in some instances, notice may suffice—in certain cases, indeed, such as those relating to dangers which lurk in navigable waters, notice may be the usual as well as the best means of protecting the invitee. In other instances fencing, or watching, or repair, or re-construction may be requisite. And lastly, I see nothing in all this to bear harshly on the occupier. He controls the premises, he serves his own interest by the invitation, he has left to him all the pleas open to one accused of negligent conduct. Why should he be exonerated, or partly exonerated, from the duty of taking reasonable care? I have been unable to find any satisfactory answer to that question in principle or authority.

My Lords, I have already said enough to apply the view I favour to the facts of this particular case. Had the appellants taken due care for the respondent’s safety, they would have taken steps to make the staging adequate for its purpose. They did nothing and should, accordingly, be held liable. For these reasons I am entirely in agreement with the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal.

LORD REID (read by LORD PORTER): My Lords, the relevant facts in this case are simple. The respondent sustained injuries without negligence on his part. Those injuries were caused by the state of the appellants’ premises being so unsafe that an accident could and did occur in spite of the respondent having full knowledge of the danger and in spite of the respondent having taken proper care for his own safety. The respondent was a servant of a sub-contractor. He had no contract with the appellants. His position was simply that of an invitee, the appellants being the inviters. The respondent had been working at the place where the accident happened for some considerable time before his accident and the danger was obvious to him. Indeed, it would have been obvious to any ordinary person. The appellants must be taken to have been aware of the danger and there is nothing to suggest that there would have been any difficulty in making the place reasonably safe. The place was under the control of the appellants and the respondent had no right to make any alteration to diminish the danger.

The decision of this case depends, in my judgment, on the question whether the duty of an invitor to an invitee can never be more than to see that the invitee is fully aware of the dangerous state of premises which he is invited to use, or whether, notwithstanding that his invitee has such knowledge, the invitor can ever be under a duty to take care to make his premises reasonably safe for the use which he invites his invitee to make of them. If such a duty can exist in any circumstances, the facts here are such that, in my opinion, it must exist in this case. This case was argued, I think rightly, on the footing that this question is still an open question, and, therefore, I think that it should first be considered as a question of principle. I do not doubt that the law is now firmly established that a person who comes to premises occupied by another with whom he has no contractual relation must be either an invitee, a licensee, or a trespasser. The respondent here was, undoubtedly, an invitee. There was a danger on the appellants' premises and the first question is whether the existence of that danger created any duty at all towards their invitee. If it did, it will then be necessary to inquire what was the nature of that duty.

There are many dangers the existence of which creates no duty at all to an ordinary invitee. (I express no opinion about a case when an invitee has some special quality.) These are generally referred to as dangers which are not "unusual." Such dangers can be found in most industrial premises and, indeed, in private houses. The roof of a house is often a dangerous place. Such dangers are well known. Either they cannot be removed, or their removal is so difficult that in practice reasonable people do not remove them. If removal of a danger is easy, it could hardly be a usual danger, because reasonable people who are careful of the safety of others would remove such dangers from their premises. The danger in this case was not one commonly found and it was easy to remove, so at first sight it would seem clearly to fall within the class of dangers the existence of which creates a duty. It is said, however, that a danger unusual in this sense may become usual for a particular invitee by his becoming accustomed to it and that, when that happens, the invitor ceases, as regards that invitee, to have any duty.

I have not observed any case in which this point was taken before Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4). In that case, the plaintiff's horse and cart sustained damage in a yard belonging to the company. The plaintiff was an invitee and it was held that an invitee of a railway company had no higher right than an invitee of any other invitor. It was held that no breach of duty causing the accident had been proved, but in the course of his judgment PHILLIMORE, L.J., dealt with the question whether the premises were reasonably safe and held that that meant reasonably safe for the plaintiff. He said ([1915] 1 K.B. 596):

"I am not certain that a way to avoid misapprehension which might arise from the use of the words 'unusual danger'—which means, in my opinion, danger unusual for the particular person—might not be found by substituting the word 'unexpected' for 'unusual.' It is not a question whether the danger is unusual with regard to all the world, but whether it is unusual with regard to the individual complainant. In other words, in analysing the expression 'reasonably safe' one must take into account what is called in modern parlance the personal equation; what may not be safe for one person may be safe enough for the persons who frequent particular business premises. For instance, in loading a ship in a dock a gangway consisting of a plank without a handrail may safely be provided, though its narrowness or slope may be such that ordinary persons, not accustomed to ships, might not find it easy to use, because the stevedore and seamen who are to use it can use it safely. The gangway has to be safe for the class of persons who use it on business, and so far as any complainant is concerned it has to be reasonably safe for him. If it is safe for him, it does not matter whether or not it is safe for anybody else. It is for that reason that the element of knowledge comes in."

PICKFORD, L.J., agreed (ibid., 598) with this explanation of the word "unusual," but it must be noted that, immediately before doing so, he had cited with approval passages from the judgments of LUSH, J., and BRAY, J., in the court below. LUSH, J., said ([1914] 2 K.B. 160):

"... I think it is not accurately said that the defendants are free from liability merely because there was no hidden or concealed trap."

BRAY, J., said (ibid., 163):

"... it was at least a duty to take reasonable care that their premises were reasonably safe for persons using them in the ordinary and customary manner and with reasonable care."

I agree with PHILLIMORE, L.J., at least to this extent. In considering whether a danger is usual or unusual you must have regard to the nature of the place where it is and to the apparent experience of the invitee. A danger may be usual for a stevedore but quite unusual for an ordinary tradesman. In this case, however, LYNSKEY, J., went considerably farther than that. He appears to have taken the view that, although the danger might be unusual for the particular invitee when he first arrived at the place, it would become for him a usual danger when he appreciated it. LYNSKEY, J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 170):

"The duty to an invitee is stated in that oft-quoted passage from the judgment of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (3) and is (L.R. 1 C.P. 288): '... that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know; and that, where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care had been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as a matter of fact.' From this passage it seems clear that the only duty imposed on the invitor, or occupier, is to prevent damage from unusual danger. This, of course, raises the question of what is unusual danger. Is it danger unusual generally, or is it danger unusual in premises of the type, description and use, to which the invitation is extended, or is it a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee, regard being had to the type, description and use of the premises to which he has been invited? In my view, 'unusual danger' means a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee: see PHILLIMORE, L.J.'s judgment ([1915] 1 K.B. 596) in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (4). It must be, from his point of view, unexpected in the particular circumstances in which he is availing himself of the invitation. It may be that other persons might expect such dangers or might know of their existence in the premises on which he goes, but if he, acting reasonably and exercising due care for his own safety, did not appreciate the existence of the danger, or its nature, or its extent, it would be to him an unusual danger. On the contrary, if an invitee does appreciate the existence on the premises to which he is invited of a danger and its nature and extent, it cannot be to him an unusual danger."

I do not agree with that for two reasons. In the first place, it would be contrary to ordinary principles that the question whether one person owes a duty to another should depend, not on objective considerations or on facts which he can ascertain, but on the state of mind of that other person which may well be unknown to him. Secondly, what is the position to be if the danger is highly unusual in the ordinary sense, but is at once appreciated by the invitee when he sees it? If "usual" is an apt word, as I think it is, to denote the class of dangers which give rise to no duty, it would surely be a misuse of language to say that something hitherto unknown has become "usual" the moment it is seen. Counsel for the appellants, in his admirably candid argument, did not attempt to support this. He simply put the argument in this way: As soon as a danger is known to and appreciated by the invitee the invitor's duty is at an end. That, however, goes rather to the nature and extent of the duty than to the question whether there is any duty in respect of a particular danger.

I think that in this case there was a duty in respect of the danger which caused the accident and that the real question is what was the nature and extent of that duty. Three views have been suggested. In the first place, it has been said that the duty of an invitor is to make his premises reasonably safe (at least, in so far as that is practicable). Secondly, it can be said that the invitor has the option to make his premises reasonably safe or to give to his invitee adequate notice of the danger, and that, if he adopts the latter alternative, his duty is at an end. Thirdly, his duty can be said to be to use reasonable care to prevent damage to his invitee. I think that the first of these clearly puts too high a duty on the invitor. It is easy to imagine many situations which are highly dangerous to a person without knowledge of the danger, but which to a person with such knowledge become safe. The danger is so situated that the invitee can continue to accept the invitor's invitation and at the same time without difficulty avoid the danger. He can only suffer damage from the danger after he knows about it if he acts in complete disregard for his own safety. In such a case, I can see no reason why an invitor should have to do any more than see that his invitee has the necessary knowledge. Reasonable care for the safety of the invitee could not require more. There are, however, other cases where full knowledge of the danger gives no assurance of safety. If a man is invited to work for a long period in a place where a slight slip on his part may lead to disaster, the fact that he realises the danger goes but a short way to assure his safety. Therefore, I find it necessary to examine somewhat narrowly the view that an invitor is entitled to discharge his duty to his invitee merely by giving notice of the danger when it would be easy for him to ensure his invitee's safety by removing the danger. In such a case, if the true view is that it is the duty of the invitor to use reasonable care to prevent damage to the invitee, then it would be his duty to remove the danger. If, in the present case, it was the duty of the appellants to use reasonable care to prevent damage to the respondent while he was on their premises in response to their invitation, doing work which it was their common interest to have done, then, in my judgment, the appellants clearly failed in their duty. On the other hand, if the appellants' duty to the respondent came to an end once he had knowledge of the danger, then, of course, the appeal must succeed.

It is convenient at this point to deal with arguments based on Donoghue v. Stevenson (1). In that case the defender had parted with control of a dangerous object, but he was nevertheless held liable to the person ultimately injured by it. It is plain that a person who has parted with control cannot have the same duty as a person who retains control and can, therefore, remain under a continuing duty down to the time when damage is suffered. I can find nothing in this class of case which assists towards the determination of the question now in issue.

I think that the authorities on the duty of an invitor to his invitee can be summarised in this way. The point at issue in this case has never been the subject of decision and there is no clear indication that it has been specifically considered in the course of any case. Text writers of authority have considered the question but have expressed no decided opinion. There are a number of cases in which brief general statements of the duties of an invitor have been made. Many of these do not appear to be intended to be more than adoptions or paraphrases of the judgment of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (3). Some tend to give a wider interpretation of that judgment by emphasising the duty to take care. Others tend to give a narrower interpretation by emphasising the importance of giving notice of concealed dangers. As almost all discussions of this subject start from the judgment of WILLES, J., and particularly from that passage in the judgment which I have already quoted, I must first state what I conceive to be its meaning and effect. I do not for a moment doubt the authority of this passage. Its words have clearly been chosen with great care and if one were dealing with facts at all comparable with the facts in that case, or, indeed, with any situation of a kind which WILLES, J., can be supposed to have had in mind, it would hardly be necessary to go beyond his judgment. I do not think, however, that this judgment was meant to be, or can properly be used as, a codification of the law. In dealing with a situation different from anything contemplated in that judgment, I do not think that it is very helpful to analyse that passage as if it were a section in an Act of Parliament. I prefer to seek the principles underlying the judgment which are, I think, of general application. In the first place, I think that the judgment recognises that it is only with regard to a certain class of dangers that any duty arises. I have stated my view about that and I do not think that my view conflicts in any way with this judgment. In the second place, WILLES, J., does not state the invitor's duty alternatively as a duty either to take care or to give notice. He states the invitor's duty as a general duty to use reasonable care and he does not lay down any particular method as one which an invitor is in all circumstances entitled to adopt in discharging his duty. On the contrary, he mentions a variety of methods, "notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise," and must, I think, have had in mind that such method should be adopted as reasonable care in the circumstances requires. I think that his meaning is that what reasonable care requires in any particular circumstances is a matter of fact. Therefore, I can find no support in this judgment for the view that, as a matter of law, the invitor always has the option to give notice and do nothing more. There are, it is true, many cases in which the duty has been stated in an alternative form—that the invitor must either make his premises safe or give notice of unusual dangers. It appears to me that those cases are of one or other of two kinds. In some of the cases, the circumstances were such that the invitor was entitled to assume that, once the invitee knew of the danger, he would avoid it. In others, a principle similar to that underlying the defence of volenti non fit injuria was assumed to be applicable. It seems to have been held that, if an invitee continues to accept the invitor's invitation after he knows the danger, the law must infer that he has agreed to accept the risk from that danger.

I shall deal with the former class of case first. Cases of this kind have arisen in a wide variety of circumstances. Those dealing with invitation to ships are as good an example as any. The leading case on invitation to ships is The Moorcock (21). In that case, wharfingers invited a ship to discharge at their jetty. They did not control the bed of the river adjoining the jetty where the ship must lie, but they took no step to ascertain whether it was a safe place. The vessel lying at the jetty grounded and sustained damage from the uneven condition of the bed of the river. The wharfingers were found liable for the damage. BOWEN, L.J., said (14 P.D. 69):

"Assume that the berth outside had been absolutely under the control of the owners of the jetty, that they could have repaired it and made it fit for the purpose of the unloading and the loading. If this had been the case, then the case of The Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs (22) shows that those who owned the jetty, who took the money for the use of the jetty . . . would have been bound to take all reasonable care to prevent danger to those who were using the jetty—either to make the berth outside good, or else not to invite ships to go there—either to make the berth safe, or to advise persons not to go there.”

BOWEN, L.J., then pointed out that the berth outside was not under the actual control of the jetty owners, but nevertheless they were not relieved of all responsibility. He said (ibid., 70):

“ . . . if they let out their jetty for use they at all events imply that they have taken reasonable care to see whether the berth, which is the essential part of the use of the jetty, is safe, and if it is not safe, and if they have not taken such reasonable care, it is their duty to warn persons with whom they have dealings that they have not done so.”

This case is not directly in point, but it has been used as if the passage which I last quoted was equally applicable in a case where the defendant is in control of the place where the danger is. I think that an examination of the case makes it plain that this is not so. In Tredegar Iron & Coal Co. v. Calliope (Owners), The Calliope (23), LORD HALSBURY, L.C., after referring to The Moorcock (21), said ([1891] A.C. 14):

“ . . . either he ought not to have invited the vessel or he ought to have informed the vessel what the condition of things was when she was invited, so that the injury might have been avoided.”

The italics are mine. LORD HALSBURY, L.C., must, I think, have taken the view that in that case warning would have led to safety, and, as I have said, I have no doubt that warning in such a case is all that reasonable care for the safety of the invitee requires. In Anchor Line v. Dundee Harbour Trustees (13) two ships sustained damage owing to the unsafe state of the approaches to Dundee harbour. VISCOUNT HALDANE said (1922 S.C. (H.L.) 83):

“ Their legal position would thus be like that of the plaintiff in the well-known case of Indermaur v. Dames (3) and they would be entitled to look for the discharge of a duty resting on the respondents to exercise reasonable care to avert peril to them from any unusual danger of which the respondent knew or ought to have known. It is important to have this in mind inasmuch as it bears on the extent of the counter duty of those approaching the harbour as regards the standard of skill required of them in navigating their vessels in the course of such approach. The latter, approaching under such an invitation as I have referred to, are entitled to rely on care having been taken by those inviting them to avert any unusual danger of which they are cognisant. I think that the duty imposed on the harbour trustees arose, not only under the principle of invitation, but as the result of s. 92 of [the Dundee Harbour and Tay Ferries Consolidation Act, 1911]. On the other hand, those approaching with their vessels must, notwithstanding their right to rely on such care having been exercised, use care on their part not to incur peril rashly.”

Here, again, it seems to me that the harbour authority would be entitled to expect that a ship being warned of a danger would avoid it, and, therefore, warning would be an adequate discharge of their duty. I do not think it necessary to consider further instances of this kind.

Cases where the defendant was entitled to assume that warning would be an adequate protection are, in my opinion, clearly distinguishable from the present case. In this case, the respondent returned to the dangerous place day after day, and the appellants knew that the respondent's knowledge of the danger was no protection to him. How, then, does it come about that the appellants' duty towards him had ceased, unless, indeed, it has to be said that the only inference which the law permits to be drawn from such circumstances is that the respondent, by returning to his work in knowledge of the danger, must be held to have accepted the risk and relieved the appellants of their duty to take care? Some of the expressions of opinion that warning is sufficient appear to be based on the view that, if the invitee is warned or gets to know of the danger, he must then elect either to continue to accept the invitation at his own risk or to go away, and that, if in knowledge of the danger he continues to accept the invitation, he will be deemed to have accepted the risk of injury to himself. In Cavalier v. Pope (6) LORD ATKINSON said ([1906] A.C. 432):

"It is, I think, clear that the case does not come within the principle of Indermaur v. Dames (3) and the cases which followed it down to Earl v. Lubbock (24), because one of the essential facts necessary to bring a case within that principle is that the injured person must not have had knowledge or notice of the existence of the danger through which he has suffered. If he knows of the danger and runs the risk he has no cause of action."

That statement was obiter because the case was decided in favour of the landlord against the tenant's wife on a different ground—that she, not being a party to the contract, had no right to require the landlord to repair the premises. Moreover, the landlord was not in occupation of the place where the danger was, and it has since been decided that, even if damage is suffered by an invitee of the tenant in a place which the landlord does occupy, that invitee is only the licensee of the landlord: see Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (16) and Jacobs v. London County Council (25). LORD ATKINSON's dictum has, however, been quoted with approval in later cases. For example, it was so quoted by SWINFEN EADY, L.J., and BANKES, L.J., in Brackley v. Midland Ry. Co. (7). That was a case where an intending passenger crossing a bridge slipped on ice which was an obvious danger. It was held that the bridge was part of a highway, but that, even if the plaintiff had been an invitee of the company, she could not recover because, knowing the danger, she had run the risk. The case was distinguished from Osborne v. London & North Western Ry. Co. (10) because in Osborne's case (10) the defence volenti non fit injuria had failed. It is, I think, clear that the court in Brackley's case (7) took the view that an invitee, who knew the danger, was presumed to have undertaken the risk. It is at this point that I think that the most difficult question in this case arises. There is no doubt that, when the defence volenti non fit injuria is pleaded, it is now well recognised that it is not enough to show that the plaintiff was well aware of the danger. There must also be evidence from which it can properly be inferred that he agreed to accept the risk. It is said, however, that the rule is different in a question between invitor and invitee. It is said, if I understand the argument rightly, that here it is not a question of a defence, but that, when the invitor tells the invitee of the danger, he thereby relieves himself of any further duty or liability to the invitee, with the result that, whether the invitee consciously elects to run the risk or not, he is, in fact, confronted with the option of continuing to accept the invitor's invitation at his own risk or going away. There may be a technical distinction, but, if I am entitled to look at the substance of the matter, I can see no substantial distinction. It seems to me that all the reasons which have led courts for many years past to stress the difference between volens and sciens are equally valid here. The defence of volenti non fit injuria is of general application. It is not confined to cases between master and servant. That is clearly explained by LORD HALSBURY, L. C., in Smith v. Baker & Sons (26), and the limitations of that defence are founded on general considerations of good sense. In Smith v. Baker & Sons (26) LORD WATSON said ([1891] A.C. 355), on the assumption that a workman appreciated his danger:

"... I am unable to accede to the suggestion that the mere fact of his continuing at his work, with such knowledge and appreciation, will in every case necessarily imply his acceptance. Whether it will have that effect or not depends, in my opinion, to a considerable extent upon the nature of the risk, and the workman's connection with it, as well as upon other considerations which must vary according to the circumstances of each case."

In Bowater v. Rowley Regis Corpn. (2) SCOTT, L.J., said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 465):

"... a man cannot be said to be truly 'willing' unless he is in a position to choose freely; and freedom of choice predicates, not only full knowledge of the circumstances on which the exercise of choice is conditioned, in order that he may be able to choose wisely, but the absence from his mind of any feeling of constraint, in order that nothing shall interfere with the freedom of his will."

Such considerations are almost as much applicable in a case like the present as they are in a case of master and servant. It may be just as difficult for a sub-contractor's servant to leave his work because he fears danger as it is for a servant of the main contractor who is in occupation of the premises. I do not think that it is certain or even probable that every invitee who is sciens is, in fact, also volens, so any rule of law that an invitee who is sciens must be deemed to have accepted the risk of which he was aware can only be founded on a fiction. I would not be prepared to assent to the introduction of a further fiction into the law in any case where that could be avoided.

Of course, if all these considerations are irrelevant, if your Lordships are forced by some overriding principle or by binding authority to disregard them, then there is no more to be said. If, however, this is really an open question, then such considerations do not appear to me to be irrelevant. If they were relevant when one branch of the law was being developed, they are, I think, equally relevant now. In my judgment, the duty of an invitor is not merely to take care that his invitee knows of unusual dangers. His duty is that, so long as he holds out his invitation, he shall take reasonable care for the safety of his invitee unless the invitee has relieved him of that duty by accepting the risk.

The only question which remains is whether it can be held in this case that the respondent did, in fact, accept the risk and relieve the appellants of their duty towards him. I do not doubt that an invitee can, if he chooses, accept the risk of injury to himself from a danger known to him, and, if he does accept that risk, he cannot thereafter hold the invitor liable for any injury which may result to him from that danger. In effect, his acceptance of the risk brings to an end the invitor's duty to him with regard to that danger. Further, I do not doubt that a man does not have to state expressly that he accepts a risk. His acceptance can be inferred from the whole facts of the case. I do not, however, think that it can be held in this case that, as a matter of fact, the respondent did accept the risk of injury to himself from the dangerously inadequate staging. I understood counsel for the appellants to state expressly that he did not put forward that case. His case was that, as a matter of law, no matter what the circumstances may be, an invitee who continues to accept an invitation in knowledge of the danger involved cannot be heard to say that he has not accepted the risk, and I have already said why I do not agree with that. I do not think that on the pleadings counsel could properly have done otherwise. There is nothing in the appellants' pleadings to raise this issue. The appellants merely deny negligence on their part and allege negligence on the part of the respondent, and that is all. It is true that LYNKEY, J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 171):

"If it were necessary to decide it I should have held on the facts of this case that [the respondent] did freely and voluntarily impliedly agree to accept the risk of working on the staging with full knowledge of the nature and the extent of the risk he ran."

I do not know what virtue there is in the word "impliedly." If the learned judge merely means that acceptance of the risk must be inferred from the respondent's having continued to work in knowledge of the danger, then, for the reasons which I have given, I do not agree with that, but, if he means that the whole facts of the case are sufficient to prove acceptance of the risk by the respondent, I do not think that he was entitled to make such a finding, and I do not think that it is open to your Lordships to make such a finding now. We do not know what the evidence would have been if the issue had been properly raised. If there is in this matter a difference between sciens and volens, and if it is not enough to prove knowledge, then the burden of proving facts to show that the plaintiff was volens as well as sciens must lie on the defendant and it cannot, in my judgment, be held that that burden has been discharged in this case.

To return to the main question, this case will decide whether an invitor's duty is determined by a rule, which seems to me to have no foundation in principle, that he can, while continuing to hold out an invitation, always relieve himself of his duty to take care by giving notice. I do not deny that fixed rules have advantages. Cases can be more readily decided and people interested can, perhaps, forecast more accurately what the decision will be in any case, but in the realm of negligence, at least, rigid rules give rise to what I believe to be avoidable injustice. I see no reason to depart unnecessarily from the simple method of asking in any case: What would a reasonable man in the shoes of the defendant have done? That test is subject to obvious limitations. In some cases it is impracticable and in many cases it is for one reason or another undesirable to make that which a reasonable man would do a legal obligation, but I see no such difficulty in this case. In this case, I have no doubt that a reasonable man in the position of the appellants would have averted the danger which caused damage to the respondent by providing more adequate staging. Why, then, was it not the appellants' duty to do this? I have come to the conclusion that to hold that there was such a duty would infringe no principle and would conflict with no binding or well-recognised authority. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

R. v. PATEL.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Humphreys, Hilbery and Byrne, JJ.), April 30, May 1, 8, 1951.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Admissibility—Matters not subject of charge—Evasion of purchase tax—Evidence of like transaction.

The appellant was convicted on an indictment containing five counts charging him with the fraudulent evasion of purchase tax in respect of quantities of nylon stockings and one count charging him with conspiring with other persons to evade such tax. It was alleged that he had obtained the goods without paying the purchase tax and consigned them to persons who were not registered traders and who bought, not for the purpose of exportation, but for sale on the home market. The prosecution called evidence of a similar transaction in which the appellant took part, although no charge in respect of it was included in the indictment.

HELD: the evidence in regard to the other transaction was relevant to the issue whether the appellant had assisted in the conspiracy to evade purchase tax, and was, therefore, admissible and the appeal must be dismissed.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, Framroze Patel, was convicted at the Central Criminal Court on an indictment which charged him, in the first count, with conspiring with other persons and a company to evade, and in five further counts with evading, the payment of purchase tax in respect of transactions relating to nylon stockings. He was sentenced to a total of three years' imprisonment and was fined £200 on each count. The ground of appeal was that evidence of a transaction which did not form one of the charges in the indictment had been wrongly admitted.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 8. BYRNE, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. Before dealing with the facts of this appeal, the court desires to impress on those who are concerned with the administration of criminal law the necessity of adhering to the practice referred to in R. v. Cole (1), approved in R. v. Hammond (2), and stated to be the only proper course in an ordinary case in R. v. Zielinski (3). As stated in the headnote to the last-mentioned case (34 Cr. App. Rep. 193):

"Where defending counsel has informed counsel for the prosecution that he intends to object to the admissibility of certain evidence, it is, as a general rule, undesirable that the argument on admissibility should be heard and the issue decided before the case is opened. The proper course is for counsel for the prosecution to refrain from referring to the evidence in his opening, and that the issue should be decided at the appropriate moment in the case when the evidence is tendered."

The present case is a good example of the confusion likely to arise from the modern practice, pursued in this case, of inviting the judge to rule on the admissibility of evidence expected to be given, the relevance of which may well be affected by other evidence in the case. In fact, the full evidence opened to the jury by permission of the learned commissioner at the Central Criminal Court was never given at all, but a small, and as we think, innocuous instalment was given and the accuracy of that evidence was not disputed. We further think it well to remind those who prosecute, as well as those who try long criminal cases, that complication is a weapon for the defence. The fewer and simpler the issues left to the jury the less chance there is of a miscarriage of justice. With all deference to the experienced commissioner, who was plainly doubtful whether the further evidence should be admitted, there is an ancient maxim that the accused is entitled to the benefit of any doubt.

The appellant was tried before the commissioner with three other persons, Ghulam Shamas, Somer Ali, and Ilam Dean, and a company called Welford

A Hawes & Co., Ltd., upon an indictment which contained six counts. In the first count the appellant, the three individuals, and the company were charged with conspiring together and with two other persons, Gerrard Peter Scott and Sher Mohamed, and other persons unknown to be knowingly concerned in the taking of steps with a view to the fraudulent evasion of purchase tax in respect of transactions relating to nylon stockings. In the second count the appellant, Ghulam Shamas, and the company were charged with the fraudulent evasion of purchase tax in respect of 1,320 pairs of nylon stockings on Sept. 15, 1949. In the third count the appellant, Ghulam Shamas, Ilam Dean, and the company were charged with a similar offence in respect of six thousand pairs of nylon stockings on Oct. 2, 1949. In the fourth count the appellant, Somer Ali, Ilam Dean, and the company were charged with a similar offence in respect of six thousand pairs of nylon stockings on Nov. 9, 1949. In the fifth count the appellant, Somer Ali, Ilam Dean, and the company were charged with a similar offence in respect of 1,560 pairs of nylon stockings on Nov. 11, 1949, and in the sixth count the appellant and the company were charged with a similar offence in respect of 1,836 pairs of nylon stockings on Jan. 3, 1950. After a trial which lasted nine days, the appellant was convicted on all the counts in the indictment, and the other defendants were convicted on all the counts in which they were charged with the exception of Ilam Dean who, on the direction of the commissioner, was acquitted on the third count.

D The case for the prosecution was that the appellant, with the assistance of Gerrard Peter Scott, a director of Welford Hawes & Co., Ltd., used that company, which was insolvent but was registered for purchase tax, for obtaining without payment of purchase tax large supplies of nylon stockings, which were at once consigned to non-registered traders who bought the stockings, not for the purpose of exporting them, but for sale on the home market. The appellant's case was that he had been deceived by Scott, that he did not know that Scott was evading the payment of purchase tax, and that except in one instance he did not know that the goods were nylon stockings or that they were being sold to unregistered traders for sale on the home market.

F There was abundant evidence that the appellant had financed the purchase of nylon stockings by Welford Hawes & Co., and that he had arranged the transport of the goods which had gone to unregistered traders in this country, and it would have been surprising if a jury had failed to draw the inference that he had full knowledge of the transactions and knew perfectly well that the payment of purchase tax was being evaded. Nevertheless, the prosecution were not content to rest their case on that evidence, but called witnesses with regard to another transaction in which the appellant took part, but which was not the subject of any of the counts in the indictment. That transaction related to a firm called Central Oriental Agency and the evidence established the fact that on behalf of that firm the appellant placed orders for nylon stockings for which he paid. G The appellant, with leave of the court, now appeals against conviction on the ground that the evidence with regard to that other transaction was inadmissible. The court was, therefore, left in the position of trying to steer between the Scylla of releasing to the world unpunished an obviously guilty man and the Charybdis of upholding the conviction of a possibly innocent one. In such a case the court would lean to the more merciful course, since it is better to release the guilty H than to run the risk of convicting the innocent.

It is unnecessary to deal with the transaction relating to Central Oriental Agency in detail. It is sufficient to say that two witnesses were called with regard to it—Mr. Triggs and Mr. Holderoft. In our view, the question whether their evidence was admissible may be dealt with shortly. That the case against the appellant without that evidence was an almost conclusive one we have no doubt, that the evidence of those two witnesses made it no stronger we are also agreed, for all that those persons proved was that on May 23, 1949, the appellant went to the place of business of Mr. Triggs, representing himself as the buying agent for the Central Oriental Agency, the principal of that firm being a Mr. Sastry, and gave an order for eleven hundred dozen pairs of nylon stockings to be delivered to certain packers. Mr. Triggs communicated with his principals, the manufacturers, who accepted the order. The goods were said to be required for export to Pakistan, and some of them at least were not suitable for the English market owing to their garish colours. The goods were paid for by the appellant with a banker's draft for £3,993. What became of the bulk of that order was never proved. We are not concerned with the object of the prosecution in calling that evidence. Counsel for the Crown in opening, suggested that it would be admissible on one of the grounds mentioned by LORD SUMNER in Thompson v. R. (4) ([1918] A.C. 232), as tending to prove guilty knowledge or system. If the whole of the evidence had been called it might have been, but the evidence of the two witnesses called failed to carry the case far enough.

The doctrine there referred to relates solely to the proof of other crimes by the accused. The doctrine applicable to this case is the far older one that no irrelevant evidence should be admitted in a criminal case. In our opinion, from that point of view, it cannot be said that the evidence was irrelevant. The case against the appellant was that he financed the three deals the subject of counts 2 to 6 of the indictment. Here was another case in which he was financing another concern to the tune of £4,000. Since his business, apparently, consisted of financing companies with which he was not directly connected when those companies were placing orders for nylon stockings which purported to be orders for export, could the jury believe that in the cases charged he made no inquiries and took no interest in what became of the goods ordered and paid for by him. The jury might well take the view that the more instances of his financing which were proved, the less could they accept his explanation. We are not prepared to hold that the evidence of the two gentlemen named was irrelevant. Turning to the summing-up, that appears to be the way in which the commissioner was inviting the jury to consider the case against the appellant.

That there was a fraudulent evasion of purchase tax was, apparently, admitted. In such a case the man who financed the deal, including the transport of the goods to English destinations, will naturally be regarded as at the head of the conspiracy. The appellant's defence did not deny the facts. His case was: "I got the money from Scott." The jury may well have considered that that afforded no answer to the charge when the evidence of the relationship which existed between Scott and the appellant was considered. Scott and the appellant were co-directors of Scott, Mills & Co., Ltd. from June 28, 1949, and on July 15, Mr. Phillips, a senior investigating officer of Customs and Excise, spoke to Scott about purchase tax which was payable on nylon stockings acquired by Scott, Mills & Co., Ltd. On Aug. 18 Mr. Phillips told the appellant that he wished to see him, as it appeared that Scott, Mills & Co., Ltd. owed £2,000 purchase tax, to which the appellant replied that he had financed some of the company's purchases, but had dealt with the manager, Scott. Not only were the appellant and Scott co-directors of Scott, Mills & Co., Ltd., but on Aug. 25 Scott became a director of Welford Hawes & Co. and less than a month later—on Sept. 15—the appellant ordered transport for the first consignment of nylon stockings ordered by Welford Hawes & Co. For these reasons we have come to the conclusion that the evidence with regard to the other transaction was admissible, and the appeal is, therefore, dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

STEVENS v. SEDGMAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Birkett, L.JJ.), May 8, 9, 1951].

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Allotment—Land of half an acre used for production of produce for sale—Notice to quit—Allotments Act, 1925 (c. 61), s. 1—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 1 (1).

A piece of land, of whatever size, which is an allotment within the definition in s. 1 of the Allotments Act, 1925, and is used by a tenant for growing vegetables for the purposes of trade or business is also an agricultural holding within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 1 (1), and, therefore, a tenancy thereof can only be determined by the twelve months' notice to quit prescribed by s. 23 (1) of the Act of 1948.

FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1948, s. 1 (1), (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Continuation Vol., 1948, p. 26.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE RAWLINS, made at Helston County Court on Mar. 13, 1951, whereby he allowed the landlord's claim for possession of a field.

The learned judge held that the land, comprising half an acre, which was used by the tenant for the production of vegetables for sale, was an allotment within the Allotments Act, 1925, s. 1, and that the tenancy was terminable by six months' notice to quit. For the tenant it was contended that the land was an agricultural holding within the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 1 (1), (2) and that twelve months' notice was required.

E. B. Gibbens for the tenant.

Comyn for the landlord.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The landlord sought possession of a field of half an acre, let at a rent of 5s. per year, having given the tenant six months' notice to quit. The defence was that no, or no sufficient, notice to quit had been given. The question was whether the field was an agricultural holding within the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. The learned judge found that it was an allotment within the definition of "allotment" in the Allotments Act, 1925, s. 1, and held that in those circumstances it was outside the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and there was no statutory provision making the notice which had been given ineffective, and he made an order for possession.

The Allotments Act, 1922, dealt with two categories of allotment: an "allotment garden" and an "allotment." Section 1 (1) provides:

"Where land is let on a tenancy for use by the tenant as an allotment garden or is let to any local authority or association for the purpose of being sub-let for such use the tenancy of the land or any part shall not (except as hereinafter provided) be terminable by the landlord by notice to quit or re-entry, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, except by—(a) a six months' or longer notice . . ."

By s. 22 (1),

"The expression 'allotment garden' means an allotment not exceeding forty poles in extent which is wholly or mainly cultivated by the occupier for the production of vegetable or fruit crops for consumption by himself or his family."

The plot in this case was not, as found by the learned judge, an allotment garden, as its extent was over forty poles, and the tenant used it, not wholly or mainly for the production of vegetable or fruit crops for consumption by himself or his family, but for production for sale. Section 2 provides for compensation on quitting allotment gardens. Section 3 (2) provides:

"In the case of any allotment within the meaning of this section (not being an allotment garden), the tenant shall, on the termination of his tenancy by effluxion of time, or from any other cause, be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to obtain from the landlord compensation for the following matters . . ."

Then there are set out the heads in respect of which compensation can be claimed. Section 3 (5) provides:

"The Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1908 to 1921, shall, in the case of an allotment within the meaning of this section to which those Acts apply, have effect as if the provisions of this section as to the determination and recovery of compensation were substituted for the provisions of those Acts as to the determination and recovery of compensation, and a claim for compensation for any matter or thing for which a claim for compensation can be made under this section, may be made either under those Acts or under this section, but not under both."

That sub-section has considerable importance because it makes clear that at that stage Parliament was not intending to make the special provisions for compensation contained in this section exclusive, but intended that where the two codes both applied they should be alternative. Section 3 (7) provides:

"In this section the expression 'allotment' means any parcel of land, whether attached to a cottage or not, of not more than two acres in extent, held by a tenant under a landlord and cultivated as a farm or a garden, or partly as a garden and partly as a farm."

It is to be noted that there is no statutory provision in this Act with regard to notice to quit in respect of an allotment. Section 22 (6), which was repealed by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 58 and sched. IV, reinforces the point as to the inference which is to be drawn from s. 3 (5). It provides:

"For removing doubts, it is hereby declared that the expression 'holding' in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, and in the Agricultural Land Sales (Restriction of Notices to Quit) Act, 1919, does not include any allotment garden or any land cultivated as a garden unless it is cultivated wholly or mainly for the purpose of the trade or business of market gardening."

The fact that it was thought necessary to remove doubts with regard to the question whether an allotment garden was a "holding" seems to suggest that an allotment was regarded as a holding. I should say at once that it does not follow that because an allotment may be a holding, therefore, all allotments are holdings. If, for example, one takes the position today, for the land to come within the definition of agricultural holding it has to be shown that it is used for the purposes of a trade or business, whereas no such limitation is imposed in respect of an allotment as defined by the Allotments Act, 1922.

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 56, deals with allotments and provides:

"(1) Nothing in this Act shall affect the operation of the Allotments Act, 1922, save that sub-s. (6) of s. 22 of that Act shall cease to have effect. (2) In the case of any holding to which this Act applies consisting of a parcel of land, whether attached to a cottage or not, of not more than two acres in extent held by a tenant under a landlord and cultivated as a farm or garden, or partly as a garden and partly as a farm, this Act shall have effect as if the provisions of s. 6 of the Allotments Act, 1922, as to determination and recovery of compensation were substituted for the provisions of this Act as to the determination and recovery of compensation."

Those two sub-sections, read together, seem to me to reinforce the conclusion that these two codes remain side by side as alternatives where in the circumstances of the case they are both applicable. Section 56 (1) leaves the provisions of the Act of 1922 in effect, so an application for compensation under that Act was presumably still open. Section 56 (2) says that when the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, apply, they shall apply with one modification only, viz., the incorporation of the provisions as to the determination and recovery of possession. The Allotments Act, 1925, by s. 1, increased the area of an "allotment" from two to five acres.

Coming to the later Acts, reference was made to s. 109 (1) of the Agriculture Act, 1947, which provides:

"In this Act the expression 'agricultural land' means land used for agriculture which is so used for the purposes of a trade or business, or which is designated by the Minister for the purposes of this sub-section, and includes any land so designated as land which in the opinion of the Minister ought to be brought into use for agriculture: Provided that no designation under this sub-section shall extend—(a) to land used as pleasure grounds, private gardens or allotment gardens . . ."

I do not think that that sub-section affords much assistance because it merely deals with land which the Minister can designate, but it does fit in with the submission that whereas allotment gardens are outside the general agricultural holdings legislation, allotments, if they are in other circumstances within it, are not. The definition of agricultural holding for the purpose of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, is stated in s. 1 as follows:

"(1) In this Act the expression 'agricultural holding' means the aggregate of the agricultural land comprised in a contract of tenancy, not being a contract under which the said land is let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment or employment held under the landlord. (2) For the purposes of this and the next following section, the expression 'agricultural land' means land used for agriculture which is so used for the purposes of a trade or business . . ."

Section 23 and s. 24 deal with notices to quit in respect of agricultural holdings as defined by the Act and provide that there must be twelve months' notice, and, when that has been given, the tenant can serve a counter-notice and then the Minister's consent to the operation of the notice to quit has to be obtained. Section 100 (10) is on similar lines to s. 56 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. It provides:

"Nothing in this Act shall affect the provisions of the Allotments Act, 1922 . . ."

There does not appear there the equivalent of sub-s. (2) of s. 56 which was repealed by the Agriculture Act, 1947, s. 45 and s. 110, but I do not think any significance is to be drawn from that, because all that s. 56 (2) did was to incorporate in the agricultural holdings code where applicable in the case of allotments the particular provision in the Allotments Act as to the measurement and recovery of compensation. If Parliament thought that where somebody was entitled to come under the Agricultural Holdings Act, the whole of that Act, including its provisions as to the measure and recovery of compensation, should apply, one would have expected that sub-section to disappear.

The submission on behalf of the landlord was that on the findings of fact the land in question was an allotment, and, therefore, it was ipso facto outside the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. He also made a subsidiary submission based on the view that this was, as the evidence shows, a very small holding. I cannot find anything in the Act of 1948 to indicate that in applying the definition in s. 1 (1) and (2) one should have regard to the size of the holding. In my view, the various provisions of the statutes in the two codes to which I have referred lead to the conclusion that it cannot be said that because this piece of land is an allotment within the definition it is ipso facto outside the Agricultural Holdings Act. It seems to me that the provisions have expressly preserved the two codes as alternatives. Therefore, it having been decided that this land is plainly within the definition of agricultural holding, the fact that it is within the definition of allotment does not take it out of the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings

Act, 1948, and it follows that the provisions of that Act with regard to notice to quit apply in respect of the tenancy of this plot of land. As admittedly they have not been complied with, the learned judge's order must be set aside. For these reasons I think this appeal must be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. The distinction between an allotment garden and an allotment is important. An allotment garden is an allotment of less than a quarter of an acre where a man grows vegetables or fruit for himself and his family. It is not an agricultural holding and a notice to quit has to be a six months' notice. An allotment, on the other hand, which is used by a man for growing fruit or vegetables for the purposes of a trade or business, is an agricultural holding, and a tenancy of it can only be determined by twelve months' notice and only for certain specific reasons, which are set out in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. There is nothing in that Act to say that an allotment must be of any particular size in order to qualify to be an agricultural holding. The only essential requisite is that it must be used for the purposes of a trade or business. The learned judge has found that that essential requisite was present. The fact that it was only half an acre or a little less does not deprive it of the status of being an agricultural holding. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. The question before the learned county court judge, in form at least, was a simple question—whether the notice which is requisite should be a six months' notice or a twelve months' notice. The learned judge decided that six months' notice was sufficient, because he held this piece of land to be an allotment and not an agricultural holding which would require a twelve months' notice under the Agricultural Holdings Acts. Reading his judgment, one can see how he came to that conclusion, because he was referred to the definition of an agricultural holding in s. 1 (1) and (2) of the Act of 1948 and asked to find that the lease in question came within the section. He pointed out in his judgment:

“He [counsel for the tenant] urged and I have so found that the land is used for agriculture for the purposes of a trade or business.”

Then the learned judge proceeds:

“[Counsel for the landlord] then pointed out that by s. 100 (10) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, nothing therein is to affect the provisions of the Allotments Act, 1922. I hold this land is an ‘allotment’ within the meaning of the Allotments Act, 1925, which I observe has not been repealed by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948.”

The learned judge misunderstood the effect and meaning of sub-s. (10), and I think the construction which my Lord has put on it is the true construction. It was not adequately realised that there were two codes which could exist side by side as alternatives. I do not think that the point that it seems a little absurd to bring a small piece of land within the rather complicated machinery of the Act of 1948 with regard to notice and counter-notice and the intervention of the Minister is a matter for this court. It may be one for Parliament, but the present case could not be decided merely on the fact that this was a very small piece of land.

Appeal allowed.

MAHER v. MAHER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), April 20, May 7, 1951.]

Divorce—Foreign decree—Unilateral divorce by Mohammedan—Marriage in England of Christian woman and Mohammedan domiciled in Egypt—Divorce in Egypt.

A The wife petitioned for dissolution of marriage on the ground of her husband's desertion. The marriage took place in England on Mar. 4, 1946, the wife being a Christian domiciled in England and the husband a Mohammedan domiciled in Egypt. On June 16, 1946, the husband left his wife and did not return to her. In August, 1946, the wife was informed at the Egyptian embassy in London that her husband had divorced her, and she was given a copy of a document which stated that the husband had appeared at the Court of Personal Status in Cairo and in the presence of two witnesses had declared that he had divorced the wife. It was proved that such a form of divorce was in accordance with the Mohammedan religion and would be recognised as valid in Egypt.

B C HELD: the marriage was a civil marriage pursuant to the Marriage Acts, 1811 to 1939; it was a marriage in the Christian sense and could not be dissolved by a method of divorce appropriate to a polygamous union; it, therefore, still subsisted, and, as the husband had been guilty of desertion, the wife was entitled to a decree.

F PETITION by a wife for dissolution of marriage on the ground of her husband's desertion.

Vincent for the wife.

The husband did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

G May 7. BARNARD, J., read the following judgment. This is a petition of Kathleen Mary Maher for the dissolution of her marriage with Mohamed Aly Maher on the ground of his alleged desertion. In the prayer she asks the court to exercise its discretion in her favour, she having committed adultery.

The parties were married on Mar. 4, 1946, at the Cambridge register office. The wife at that time was twenty-two years of age, a spinster, a Christian, and domiciled in England. The husband was twenty-one years of age, a bachelor, a Mohammedan, and domiciled in Egypt. He was, at the time of the marriage, an undergraduate of Cambridge University, and it was agreed between them that when he had graduated both he and his wife were to leave England for Egypt and make their permanent home there. In the meantime they lived together at Bridge Street, Cambridge, and there has been no issue of the marriage. In June, 1946, the husband graduated, and their luggage was sent to London for transshipment to Egypt. On June 16, 1946, the husband went alone to London, ostensibly on a visit to his mother, and from that day to the present time the wife has never seen him. She wrote to him several letters at his father's address in Cairo, but received no replies. In August, 1946, on the invitation of the Egyptian embassy, she called there and was informed that her husband had divorced her and she was given a copy of the divorce certificate. For a time she believed this divorce to be valid, and, in consequence of that belief, on June 21, 1947, she signed a document at the Egyptian consulate accepting a sum of £125 in full and final settlement of any claims which she might have against her husband.

The question which I have to decide is whether the divorce which the husband effected on June 29, 1946, at Cairo is a divorce which would be recognised as valid by the courts of this country. The document, which was produced, is not a decree of any court, resulting from any divorce proceedings. It would appear to be a certificate to the effect that the husband together with two witnesses appeared at the Cairo Court of Personal Status and that there the husband declared that he had divorced his legally married wife by saying: "My wife, Kathleen Mary Collet, is divorced from me by three divorces," and that the divorce took place in the presence of the same two witnesses. The document seems to be nothing more nor less than the registration of a divorce. I have heard the evidence of Mr. Nasir and I am satisfied on his testimony that this divorce is in accordance with the Mohammedan religion and would be recognised as a valid divorce in Egypt.

It is the established rule of English law that domicile is the true test of divorce jurisdiction, and the courts of England will recognise as valid any divorce which is granted by the courts of the country where the parties are domiciled, even on a ground which is not a ground for a divorce in England. The wife acquired by her marriage an Egyptian domicile. Counsel for the wife has argued that this divorce was contrary to natural justice in that she had no notice of the proceedings, and he referred me to two cases in support of this proposition: Shaw v. A.-G. (1), and Rudd v. Rudd (2). In both cases the English courts refused to recognise a divorce granted by the court of a country in which the parties were not domiciled at the commencement of the suit. In Shaw v. A.-G. (1) LORD PENZANCE, referring to the judgment of a foreign court, said (L.R. 2 P. & D. 162):

"A judgment so obtained has, therefore, in addition to the want of jurisdiction, the incurable vice of being contrary to natural justice, because the proceedings are ex parte and take place in the absence of the party affected by them."

No notice of the proceedings in that case was personally served on the respondent, the citation being by advertisement which the respondent did not see. In Rudd v. Rudd (2) HORRIDGE, J., based his decision not only on the want of jurisdiction, but also on the ground that there had been no sufficient notice of the proceedings. The wife had been served by registered post to her last known address and by advertisement. There had, in fact, been substituted service analogous to that allowed by English courts, and the question of service seems to me to be a matter for the court which heard the case, provided it was a court of competent jurisdiction, which it was held not to be in either case. I am of opinion that the true ratio decidendi of both cases was the want of jurisdiction. In the present case there were no divorce proceedings and no amount of notice would have enabled the wife to have contested the husband's unilateral declaration of divorce. I, therefore, reject this argument.

Counsel for the wife also argued that the marriage was an English one and could not be dissolved by the law of the husband's religion. The husband, by the law of his religion, has the power of unilateral and even capricious divorce, as well as the right to have two, three or four wives at one and the same time. These factors would have been implicit in the marriage contract, if such marriage had been a Mohammedan marriage. It must be borne in mind, however, that the declaration of divorce by the husband in accordance with the law of his religion is regarded as a valid divorce by the law of the domicile. On this point R. v.

Hammersmith Superintendent Registrar of Marriages. Ex p. Mir-Anwaruddin (3) is of great assistance. In that case, which first came before the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division and later before the Court of Appeal, it was held that a marriage solemnised in this country between a Mohammedan domiciled in India and a Christian woman cannot be dissolved by the husband handing to the wife a "writing of divorcement," although that would be an appropriate means of effecting the dissolution of a Mohammedan marriage according to Mohammedan law. VISCOUNT READING, C.J., in the course of his judgment in the Divisional Court, said ([1917] 1 K.B. 642):

"Neither authority nor principle can be found in English law to establish the proposition that a marriage contracted in England is dissolved according to the law of England by mere operation of the laws of the religion of the husband and without decree of a court of law."

and further (ibid., 643):

"An Englishwoman or a woman domiciled in England who marries in England a person domiciled . . . out of the realm of England, acquires by the status of marriage the domicile of the husband and is subject to the law of that domicile, but she does not acquire his religion or become subject to the laws of his religion except in so far as they are the law of his domicile, and then to that extent only."

I do not think that LORD READING, C.J., in stating that the wife became subject to the law of her husband's domicile meant to detract in any way from his previous statement that there must be a decree of divorce of a court of law. SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in the course of his judgment in the Court of Appeal, said (ibid., 659):

"Now under these circumstances the marriage which was celebrated between the appellant and Ruby Hudd on Mar. 18, 1913, has not been dissolved by any court of competent jurisdiction (the appellant says there is none), and it is not a marriage in the Mohammedan sense which can be dissolved in the Mohammedan manner."

Later in his judgment he quoted LORD BROUGHAM in Warrender v. Warrender (4) (2 Cl. & Fin. 534):

"... if there were a country in which marriage could be dissolved without any judicial proceeding at all, merely by the parties agreeing in pais to separate, every other country ought to sanction a separation had in pais there, and uphold a second marriage contracted after such a separation. It may safely be asserted, that so absurd a proposition never could for a moment be entertained."

The marriage between the wife and the husband was a civil marriage pursuant to the Marriage Acts, 1811 to 1939, which laid down certain regulations for the contracting of monogamous marriages. It was a marriage in the Christian sense and cannot be dissolved by a method of divorce which is appropriate to a polygamous union. I, therefore, find that the marriage solemnised between the wife and the husband is a valid and subsisting marriage, the Mohammedan divorce being inappropriate to such a union. To hold otherwise would not only be contrary to the law as I understand it, but would both encourage and sanction the purely temporary unions of English women and foreigners professing the Mohammedan religion during their limited residence in this country. I am satisfied that the charge of desertion has been established, and I consider that this is a proper case to exercise discretion in favour of the wife. As she has resided in England ever since her marriage in March, 1946, I pronounce a decree nisi.

Decree nisi for dissolution of marriage.

THE TROILUS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord Reid and Lord Tucker), January 22, 23, 24, 25, May 10, 1951.]

Shipping—Salvage—Distinction between towage and salvage—Ship losing propeller—Towed to place of temporary safety—Towed to home port via ports at which repairs could be effected and alternative service available.

On July 2, 1948, the Troilus lost her propeller when she was in the Indian Ocean about 1,050 miles from Aden, and on July 5 she was taken in tow by the Stentor to an anchorage in the quarantine area at Aden where they arrived on July 12. That service was admittedly salvage. On July 17 the Troilus was towed from Aden by another vessel, the Glenogle, to Suez, where she was taken in tow by tugs through the Suez Canal to Port Said. At Port Said she was again taken in tow by the Glenogle to her home port in the United Kingdom. The Troilus could have lain in physical safety at either Aden, Suez, or Port Said, but at none of those ports were there any satisfactory facilities for repairing the vessel so as to enable her to put to sea again or for preventing the deterioration of the ship and the perishing of the cargo. The owners of the cargo on board the Troilus, who would be liable to a proportion of salvage charges, claimed that the services rendered to the Troilus after her arrival at Aden were not salvage services but towage.

HELD: the fact that the Troilus could lie in physical safety at any of the three ports, Aden, Suez or Port Said, in the circumstances stated did not transform a service, which began as salvage, into towage, nor did the continuance by the Glenogle of the service started by the Stentor change the nature thereof, and, therefore, the whole of the services rendered in towing the Troilus from Aden to the home port in the United Kingdom were salvage services.

APPEAL by the owners of cargo lately laden on board the S.S. Troilus against an order of the Court of Appeal dated Dec. 16, 1949, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 103, dismissing an appeal by the cargo owners against an award of LORD MERRIMAN, P., made on May 12, 1949.

In the action, which was brought by the owners, master and crew of the motor vessel Glenogle for salvage services rendered by them to the Troilus, her cargo and freight, LORD MERRIMAN, P., awarded £22,000. The owners of the Troilus did not appeal against the award.

A May 10. The following opinion was read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal by the owners of cargo lately laden on board the S.S. Troilus from the judgment of the Court of Appeal affirming an award made by LORD MERRIMAN, P., of £22,000 for salvage of that vessel, her cargo and freight, to the owners, master and crew of the motor vessel B Glenogle. If the award was justified—i.e., in the circumstances which existed, if the service was a salvage service—the appellants are liable to pay the amount of the award. Their contention is, however, that, at any rate so far as they are concerned, that service was not salvage inasmuch as before it was rendered the Troilus had reached a position of safety and salvage is only payable in a case where the ship against which the claim is made is in a position of danger. C The values of the interests concerned are agreed at:—ship, £193,350; cargo, £888,000; freight at risk, £15,410. The ship owners have not appealed, and, therefore, it is the cargo owner's proportion of the award which alone is in issue.

There is no substantial dispute about the facts. The Troilus was carrying a general cargo from Australia to Liverpool. In the course of her voyage on July 2, 1948, when in the Indian Ocean and about 1,050 miles from Aden, she D fractured her tail shaft at the end of the stern tube and dropped her propeller. On July 5 she was picked up by the motor vessel Stentor and towed to Aden, where she anchored in the quarantine anchorage on July 12. Messrs. Alfred Holt and Co., Ltd., are the managers of the Troilus and of the Stentor, which are both owned by the Ocean Steamship Co., Ltd. They are also managers of the motor vessel Glenogle owned by the Glen Line Co., Ltd. On July 9 Alfred Holt E & Co. by wireless had asked the master of the Glenogle whether he could tow the Troilus from Aden to Liverpool, and the master of the Glenogle replied: "Yes." The Glenogle is a twin screw motor ship of 9,513 tons gross register and was bound from Australia to the United Kingdom with a general cargo. On July 13 the master of the Troilus told the master of the Stentor (who was then ready to resume towage to Suez) that he would not be ready for two days, F and on July 14 the owners of the Stentor instructed her master to proceed on his voyage if the master of the Troilus was satisfied to lie at anchor off Aden. On the same day Alfred Holt & Co. sent instructions to the Glenogle to tow the Troilus to the United Kingdom. The Stentor then proceeded on her voyage. The Stentor had a single screw, while the twin screws of the Glenogle presumably made her more efficient for towing purposes. The Stentor also had to call at G various ports in the Mediterranean en route for England. In the present action the owners, master and crew of the Stentor claimed salvage for services rendered to the cargo in the Troilus, and her master and crew also claimed salvage for services to the Troilus herself. The President awarded the sum of £18,000 in respect of these claims. The services rendered by the Stentor are admitted to be salvage services and there is no appeal against the part of the award in her H favour.

On July 16 the Glenogle arrived at Aden, and on July 17 made fast to the Troilus, which had remained at anchor in the same position, and started to tow her to Suez. The Troilus, which was an American liberty ship, did not carry a spare propeller and tail shaft, but there was a spare of each in England. Alfred Holt & Co. considered the question of sending these spares out to the Troilus, and made inquiries for that purpose. On July 16 they received a cable from Port Said to say that the engineering works there could fit the spare propeller to the Troilus by tilting her stern sufficiently to clear the shaft aperture above the water line, and estimated the time, including the handling of cargo, at a month. On July 20 Alfred Holt & Co. inquired whether a dry dock at Malta was available for the Troilus on about Aug. 1 and the reply was that no docks were available before the end of September. On July 21 they cabled Port Said to ask whether a dry dock was available at Alexandria for the Troilus to be docked with cargo on board, and received the reply on July 22:

“suitable dry dock not available before Aug. 15 not guaranteed do not recommend.”

About July 22, Alfred Holt & Co. also inquired whether there was any suitable tug in the locality which could tow the Troilus to the United Kingdom, and ascertained that the tug Empire John, belonging to William Watkins, Ltd., would be available at Taranto on or about July 30, and would be able to tow the Troilus at approximately four knots, and the owners of the tug gave a quotation of £6,000 to tow the Troilus from off Malta to Liverpool. Alfred Holt & Co., however, were unwilling to entrust the ship to one tug for towage across the Bay of Biscay, and decided that the most satisfactory course, in the interests of all concerned in the safety of ship and cargo, was for the Glenogle to tow the Troilus to Falmouth. The Glenogle towed the Troilus to Suez, which was reached on July 25, at an average speed of 6.8 knots. Tugs then towed the Troilus through the Suez Canal, and on July 29 the Glenogle, having proceeded through the canal ahead of the Troilus, made fast to her outside Port Said, and continued with the towage. On Aug. 3 the vessels were near Malta, and on that day tug and tow were proceeding at a speed of $8\frac{1}{2}$ knots. On Aug. 8 they passed Gibraltar, and on Aug. 15 they reached Falmouth Bay. The Troilus then anchored and was subsequently towed to Liverpool by two tugs. The average speed of the towage from Port Said to Falmouth, a distance of 2,980 miles, was 7.3 knots. The appellants admitted that, if the claim of the Glenogle was salvage, the amount of the award was not excessive.

In setting out the facts I have adopted, with some slight and immaterial alterations, the statement of BUCKNILL, L.J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 105, 106), which I accept in full and which, indeed, is not in dispute. On these facts the appellants contended that the services rendered, after Aden had been reached, were towage and no longer salvage. “Salvage services,” they said, “are only those which are rendered to a ship in danger.” Once the Troilus had reached Aden, she was in perfect safety, except, perhaps, in case of a freak storm, which there was no reason to anticipate, and in the ordinary course ship and cargo could have lain there indefinitely without danger to either. The cargo, it appears, consisted of various kinds of foodstuffs, but, as the President found, was not strictly perishable and was in no immediate danger of perishing. “A few weeks’ delay,” he said, “at any rate, would not injure it.” The argument before your Lordships, as I understood it, was that the Stentor, having finished her service and left the Troilus in physical safety at Aden, the incidents prior to her coming to anchor there became irrelevant and the only question was: Had the Glenogle taken her from a position of danger to one of safety?

On this argument the first question to be answered is: Was the Troilus in physical danger while lying at Aden? In The Glaucus (1) WILLMER, J., held that a vessel which had suffered such damage to her boilers as could not be repaired at Aden was in danger while lying at the quarantine anchorage there. The President and BUCKNILL, L.J., came to the same conclusion in reference to the Troilus. In the course of the hearing of the appeal, the assessors in the Court of Appeal were asked whether the Troilus was in danger while at anchor off Aden, and replied:

“No immediate danger, but in the event of an unusual gale springing up she would certainly be in greater danger than a ship with all her main power available.”

In a sense, the answer is a truism. Any ship without motive power not in dock or securely tied up in a sheltered harbour is in great r danger than one capable of motion, but the question under consideration is not an abstract one, but whether a prudent master would be reasonably apprehensive of physical danger having regard to the weather to be anticipated in the locality while his ship lay in the anchorage which she had reached. We asked our assessors: "Would a prudent master of a steam vessel apprehend any appreciably greater danger in lying for an indefinite time with a broken tail shaft in a harbour with the features of the outer harbour at Aden, and subject to the conditions indicated in the RED SEA AND GULF OF ADEN PILOT as to that port, than he would if his ship were so lying in such a condition that he was able to use her propellers?" They answered: "No, provided she was equipped with proper tackle to keep her at anchor," and added that she was, in fact, so equipped. For the purpose of deciding this case, I am prepared to accept that answer, though I am not sure that it means more than that the Troilus was safe enough for all practicable purposes. It has to be remembered, however, that in the long run the ship would deteriorate if not removed, and, likewise, the cargo, which consisted of foodstuffs, would do so at an earlier period. The ship admittedly could not be repaired at Aden, and no one suggested that there were facilities for discharging or storing the cargo at that port. Nevertheless, whatever view may be taken of The Glaucus (1), that case cannot be decisive of the facts of this. Moreover, I agree with BUCKNILL, L.J., that there is no general rule that a ship which for some reason or other is without motive power is still in danger until she is repaired.

The solution of the question whether a ship has reached a place of safety must, I think, depend on the facts of each case, one of which is the facility for repairs at the place in question, and another the possibility of safely discharging and storing the cargo and sending it on to its destination and the danger of its deterioration. It is not a sufficient answer to say that she can lie in a particular position of physical safety. It must be remembered that in every voyage of a merchant ship carrying cargo the interests of both ship and cargo have to be borne in mind. In saying this I am not determining in one way or the other, in a case in which a decision to that effect is not required, that, if the Troilus had lost her propeller while lying at Aden, a ship which towed her to a port of safety would be entitled to salvage. In this case the services began as salvage rendered by a ship managed by the same company and were continued by another so managed because that was the safest, quickest and most convenient method of towage. It was for the joint advantage of the Troilus and her cargo, because the Glenogle was a better ship for the towage required and was sailing direct to this country, and because the Troilus was not ready to proceed until after the Stentor would and did leave in the ordinary course of her voyage. Admittedly, salvage services can be rendered by two ships in succession and I see no reason for holding that, if the Stentor had towed throughout, it might have made the whole of the service rendered salvage, whereas the substitution of the Glenogle would have put an end to any such claim. Once this aspect of affairs is accepted, the same question arises at Aden which afterwards arose at Suez and Port Said, i.e.: Does the fact that the Troilus could lie in physical safety at any of the three ports transform a service which began as salvage into towage and nothing more? There are a number of authorities, beginning with The Syria (2) which was decided by SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE in 1874 (the record of which has been furnished to us), which say that it does not. That vessel was towed from Ascension, where she was held to have been in danger, to Southampton, but on the way calls were made at Goree, at St. Vincent and at Madeira, in all three of which she and her cargo were physically safe. It was sought to distinguish that case on the ground that the Syria was admittedly in danger at Ascension, but so was the Troilus when picked up by the Stentor, and if, as I have indicated, the case is to be regarded as if the Stentor had been the towing ship throughout the voyage, the circumstances of the two cases are very much alike. In The Syria (2) the cargo was made liable as well as the ship, and though the master asked to be towed to Southampton the service was held to be a salvage service, and the only difference between that and the present case is that it was the master and not the manager who made the request. In the course of his judgment, SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE says (SHIPPING AND MERCANTILE GAZETTE, July 7, 1874):

"I have paid all attention to Mr. Butts' argument with respect to the first point, that the salvage service ceased at St. Vincent, but I am unable to assent to it. I put out of consideration the fact that both the vessels belonged to the same owners. The principle of law is independent of that fact. This service was simply salvage service, and it was intended to extend to towing this vessel to her port of destination; and the fact that she touched at a port where she might have remained in safety does not seem to alter the original contract, and make the service cease there or begin there. What the question might have been in a case where the master of the towed vessel expressed himself satisfied, and did not wish to be towed further, and made no arrangement by implication or parol, is another consideration altogether. I must consider it as a salvage service continuing over the whole six weeks."

My Lords, the basis of this judgment appears to be that a ship taken from a position of danger to her ultimate destination is still the subject of salvage, though on her voyage she is towed past, or, indeed, into, ports at which she could lie in safety, provided, of course, she continues to be so damaged that it would be unsafe for her to put to or remain at sea until she is repaired.

Nor, as I think, does Anderson v. Ocean S.S. Co. (3) in any sense make this outlook untenable. The action was in general average by a ship owner against one of the cargo owners for his proportion of the sum which the ship owner had consented to pay for salvage services rendered to the ship and cargo. Admittedly, the services were salvage services, and, consequently, the cargo owners would have to contribute to the sum due to the salvors. The dispute was as to how much their share should be and how the sum to be awarded should be ascertained. The case was tried with a jury, and it is enough to set out two of the questions put to them: (i) Did the master of the Achilles (the salvaged ship) make her owners liable to pay a named sum? (ii) Was that a reasonable course for him to pursue under the circumstances? To both questions the jury answered "Yes," but that fact was held not to be conclusive against the cargo owners. LORD BLACKBURN says (10 App. Cas. 114):

"I do not think that the owners of the Achilles could, by paying the claim of the Shanghai [the salving ship], entitle themselves to recover more from the goods owners than the Shanghai could have recovered in a salvage suit against the goods owners, but I do not see why they might not recover whatever it was fair and just should be paid as a contribution."

He says further (ibid., 117):

"I think therefore that it was quite clear that there was a contract binding on the owners of the Achilles to pay this sum of £2,691 19s. 6d. to the owners of the Shanghai, whether it was made by themselves or by their master for them is, as far as regards the binding of the owners of the Achilles, unimportant. But neither the owners of the ship nor their master have authority to bind the goods, or the owners of the goods, by any contract. The master has, I think, authority to make for his owners all disbursements which are proper for the general purposes of the voyage, and when once those disbursements are paid for, either by the master out of funds belonging to the owners which the master has, or by funds which the owners themselves apply to discharge a contract which they either could not dispute because the master had bound them to make it or did not choose to dispute, I think that the disbursement, in so far as it is a disbursement for the salvation of the whole adventure from a common imminent peril, may properly be charged to general average. But I think that there is neither reason nor authority for saying that the whole amount which the owners of the ship choose to pay is, as a matter of law, to be charged to general average. And though I quite agree that there is some evidence here that the Achilles and her cargo were both in danger, and were both saved by the services of the Shanghai, and though I also agree that it is not a question of law whether the amount of the sum charged as a disbursement was exorbitant or not, still I cannot find that any question as to the amount was submitted to the jury."

No question arose as to the point at which the service began or ended. The sole matter in dispute was what was a reasonable remuneration for the service rendered to ship and cargo. The ship must, of course, pay the contractual sum, but the cargo owners were liable, not for their proportion of the sum paid, but for their proportion of what would properly be awarded for the services rendered if no contract had been made. It differs from the case now under discussion in that the quantum has here been determined by an Admiralty judge in a Court of Admiralty and the only matter of contention is where the service began and ended.

The master or owner or manager of the vessel alleged to have been salvaged cannot, of course, bind the cargo owners to pay salvage where the services rendered are not salvage services any more than he can bind him to pay the amount which he has promised to the vessel which is said to have salvaged his ship, but this qualification in no way determines what are salvage services or how long they last. There is some authority for the proposition that a vessel so damaged as to be unable to proceed except under tow is receiving salvage services, not only when she is picked up in a position of danger, but continues to enjoy those services until she reaches her destination, and both The Reward (4) and The Princess Alice (5) differentiate between salvage and towage by attributing the former to the towing of a disabled ship and the latter to the mere acceleration of the tow's progress. My Lords, I have already said that, in my view, this statement as to the difference between the two services must not be carried too far and that I agree with BUCKNILL, L.J., that there is no established principle that a vessel which has no means of progression remains in a state of danger until she has recovered some power of propulsion even though she has come to anchor in a safe place. But your Lordships are still faced with the question: What in this collocation is meant by a safe place? Are there only the three views, either (i) a place where the ship can lie in physical safety even though she cannot be repaired there and may have to remain for an indefinite time until some problematical tug or tugs can be procured to tow her away at a fixed contract price for the towage service; or (ii) some place where she can ultimately be repaired with or without some risk but after a very considerable delay, the cargo meanwhile being either partially or wholly discharged and stored until the ship is repaired or until space in some other ship can be obtained to carry it to its destination; or (iii) the port of destination at which the cargo is to be delivered. The arguments for each of these meanings were presented to your Lordships and it may at some time and in some case be necessary to answer them, but I am not persuaded that in the present case an answer to them as presented is required.

If a vessel is in danger as defined by DR. LUSHINGTON in The Charlotte (6) (3 Wm. Rob. 71) and salvage services are offered, the master must make up his mind whether to accept them or not. In so doing he must, of course, act like a prudent master, but considerable latitude ought to be allowed him, more particularly in a case such as the present where the ship is carrying a general cargo, and it is, therefore, a difficult task involving much delay to communicate with the various owners. He is responsible for ship and cargo and the danger of failing to accept salvage services or of dispensing with them at too early a period is well illustrated by The Germania (7). Of course, if no salvage award is permissible when once the damaged vessel has reached some place where she can lie for an indefinite period in physical safety, but from which no method of egress has been shown to exist, and where, unless some means of further progress is obtained, the ship must lie deteriorating and the cargo ultimately perishing, cadit quaestio, but I do not accept that view. The master whose ship has suffered damage must do his best to preserve the ship and cargo and to bring both to their destination as cheaply and efficiently as possible. The possibility of expense and the effect of delay both on the ship and cargo must be borne in mind, and it has to be remembered that the master, manager, or owner of the ship has a difficult task in assessing what will be best for the various interests. If it is clearly to the advantage of his cargo, he ought to tranship and arrange for it to be carried on by another ship. The possibility of repair at convenient ports and the time involved and safety of the operation to ship and cargo must be borne in mind. The question, in my view, is not the simple one: "Is the ship in a position of physical safety?" I do not think that the only possibilities are to be found in the answer to one of two alternatives, viz., (i) May the master of a damaged ship which is taken in tow in a damaged condition from a position of potential danger treat the towage to his destined port as salvage services? Or (ii) Is the cargo only bound to pay its proportion of salvage up to the nearest position at which the ship can lie in physical safety? On the contrary, I think that, if the considerations mentioned above are borne in mind, a third view can be loosely expressed by saying that the salvage lasts so long as the master acts reasonably for the combined benefit of ship and cargo.

Some further support for this view is to be obtained from a number of cases decided in the Court of Admiralty. In The Idomeneus (8), BATESON, J., says (22 Ll.L. Rep. 300), in a case where the damaged ship was towed first to Port Sudan and then to Suez and it was argued that the only salvage service was the towage to Port Sudan:

"It is quite true that the principal salvage was getting the Idomeneus into Port Sudan to start with, but for the long tow the Perseus has to be paid as a steamer rendering a service, and it is really an ocean tow, and, therefore, must be properly remunerated as salvage."

In The Laomedon (9) that ship was towed by two vessels in successive stages from a position to the south and east of Perim to Malta except through the Suez Canal from Suez to Port Said when she was under the charge of tugs. The whole towage seems to have been admitted to be a salvage service and the quantum of award alone to have been in dispute, but the only excuse for proceeding to Malta appears to have been that that was the first port at which repairs could be effected and the towage was at least as much for the benefit of the cargo as that of the ship. HILL, J., says (23 Ll.L. Rep. 234):

"With regard to the Pheonius [one of the salving ships] I must reward them upon the basis that they have . . . towed this very valuable property a distance of three thousand odd miles, and that that is salvage and not towage, because throughout the whole time the Laomedon was disabled and had no means of propulsion of her own, and is salvage right up to Malta because that was the first port where she could get a new propeller."

I have already referred to The Glaucus (1) and need not deal further with that case. In none of these cases does the distinction appear to have been drawn between ship and cargo which it has been sought to establish in the present case. I cannot but believe that the reason why no such distinction was made was because in each case it was accepted that an award held reasonable in the case of the ship was reasonable in the case of the cargo also, unless it could be established that the master or owner had neglected its interests.

In the present case the whole of the facts and law were carefully considered by the learned President and unless the appellants could establish that salvage services always end where the ship can be in physical safety and where the cargo also can remain at least for some time without danger or damage, he appears
A to me to have reached the right conclusion on ample and adequate grounds. He carefully considered the opportunities for repair at each port on the voyage, the risks and delay involved and the possibilities of safe towage. Among others, he had in mind those of dry-docking the Troilus without discharging her cargo and the imprudence of tipping a liberty ship sufficiently to fit a propeller. On the last two points the Court of Appeal took the advice of their assessors who thought
B that either expedient would be unsafe, and your Lordships' assessors took the same view. In my opinion, if I may respectfully say so, the learned President has adopted the right approach to the solution of the question, and I find myself in agreement with the answer reached. This view is fortified by the judgment of the Court of Appeal, from which I differ only in that I have accepted the views of our assessors as to the physical safety of the Troilus at Aden without having
C thought it necessary to come to any definite conclusion on the point. As he took the view that the Troilus was in some danger at Aden, BUCKNILL, L.J., did not deal with the argument that the services of the Glenogle could not be salvage because she started them when the Troilus was in safety. SOMERVELL, L.J., however, as an alternative ground for his decision, did consider the question and expressed the opinion that in the circumstances the change from Stentor to D Glenogle did not affect the result. As I have said, I am of the same opinion and would dismiss the appeal with costs.

BARRATT v. GOUGH-THOMAS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), April 24, 25, 1951.]

Mortgage—Interest—Notice by mortgagor to pay off—Failure to pay on date named—Sum due not set aside and available on date of expiry of notice—Right to interest subsequent to date of expiry.

Even if there has been a tender by a borrower of the amount due for principal and interest, that tender does not stop interest running after the date of the tender unless there is evidence that the sum has been set aside and is ready for payment at any time.

In December, 1919, the plaintiff mortgaged certain property to one R. to secure a sum of £5,000. The defendant acted as solicitor for both parties and retained the original documents of title together with the mortgage deed. In February, 1941, R. died, by his will having appointed the defendant and three others his executors. On June 12, 1943, the plaintiff served on the defendant and his co-executors notice to redeem the mortgage on Dec. 14, 1943. On Dec. 4, 1943, the defendant claimed to be entitled to a lien on the deeds of the property in respect of costs incurred by the plaintiff, and asserted a right to withhold the deeds from the plaintiff on the redemption date unless he paid not only the mortgage debt and interest but also the amount due for costs. The mortgage was not redeemed on the day on which the notice of intention to pay off expired. On Feb. 11, 1944, the plaintiff stated that he was now in a position to arrange for the immediate payment off of the mortgage, and in March, 1944, he instituted redemption proceedings against the executors. On July 10, 1945, VAISEY, J., decided against the defendant's claim to a lien ([1945] 2 All E.R. 414), but on an appeal by the defendant, the Court of Appeal held (ibid., 650) that a consideration of the lien and the questions relating thereto was premature and discharged the order. In January, 1946, the defendant took a transfer of the mortgage and thenceforth became sole mortgagee. On Feb. 3, 1948, an order was made in chambers directing the taking of accounts in the redemption action. That order provided, inter alia, that the amount of interest in respect of the mortgage since Dec. 14, 1943 (being the date of expiry of the plaintiff's original notice to redeem) and the amount of certain costs of the defendant were to be separately certified. On Nov. 8, 1948, the certificate contemplated by the order was issued by the master who found that there was a principal sum of £5,000 due to the defendant, and that there was also due to the defendant a sum of £674 13s. 10d. for interest thereon, after deducting income tax, at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from Dec. 14, 1943, to the date of the certificate. The plaintiff complied with the terms of the redemption order and redeemed the mortgage. On a claim by the defendant to interest from Dec. 14, 1943, down to the date when the principal sum was paid off,

HELD: there had been no actual tender in the present case, and in the absence of evidence that any money had been set aside and was available for payment off of the mortgage on the date on which the notice to redeem expired or during the period subsequent to that date, the plaintiff, who had had the use of the mortgagee's money at all times during that period, was liable to pay interest on the mortgage to the date of actual payment.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether interest on a mortgage continued to be payable after the date on which the mortgagor's notice to pay off the mortgage expired. The facts are set out in the headnote.

Gray, K.C., and J. A. Brightman for the plaintiff.

Winterbotham for the defendant.

DANCKWERTS, J., stated the facts, and continued: The defendant's lien having finally been disposed of in that way, the matters of the interest and the costs of this action come before me for decision, that is to say, the other matters which were raised by the summons dated Feb. 7, 1949. It is claimed on behalf of the mortgagee, the defendant, that he is entitled to further interest from and after Dec. 14, 1943, down to the date when the principal sum was actually paid off. I have been referred by counsel on his behalf to a number of cases which seem to me to establish the principle that, even if there has been a tender by a borrower of the amount due for principal and interest, that tender does not stop interest running after the date of the tender unless there is evidence that the sum has been set aside and is ready for payment at any time. Those cases are: Gyles v. Hall (1); Kinnaird v. Trollope (2) (42 Ch.D. 618); Bank of New South Wales v. O'Conner (3) (14 App. Cas. 282-284) and Edmondson v. Copland (4).

F On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiff has referred me to a certain number of cases which establish, as he says, the proposition that when the delay in redemption is caused by the wrongful conduct of the mortgagee, the mortgagee is not entitled to claim interest after that date. The cases in which it appears that in the particular circumstances of the case the mortgagee was deprived of interest by reason of his wrongful conduct are Middleton (Lord) v. Eliot (5), Thornton v. Court (6), and James v. Rumsey (7). It appears to me that those cases are to some extent inconsistent with the cases on the question of tender to which I have referred. I consider that the matter depends really on the special circumstances of those cases. It seems to me that I ought to apply the principle which was laid down in the earlier cases to which I have referred. Indeed, the present case is stronger, because it appears that there was no actual tender at all in the present case, and it is very much open to doubt whether the plaintiff was in a position to pay off the mortgage on Dec. 14, 1943. It may be he would have had to raise the money from a bank or in some other way in order to do it. It is true that the plaintiff stated in his affidavit that he was ready and willing to pay off on Dec. 14, 1943, but the correspondence seems to me to be to some extent inconsistent with that, and there is, as I see the case, no evidence that any money was set aside for the purpose and was available for payment off of the mortgage on Dec. 14, 1943, or during the period subsequent to that date. It seems to me, therefore, that the plaintiff should be liable to pay interest on the mortgage at the mortgage rate down to the date of actual payment off of the principal. After all, it has to be considered that he has had the benefit of the money, which has to be regarded in the circumstances as the defendant's, the mortgagee's, money, at all times during that period. Therefore, it seems to me there is nothing inequitable in directing that the interest should be paid to the defendant as the mortgagee, and I so hold.

I now come to the question of the costs of the action, which is more difficult. As regards the costs of the action generally, and putting aside for the moment the costs of the hearing before me, it seems to me that the plaintiff plainly should have those costs—that is to say, the costs amounting to £33 odd which were referred to in the master's certificate, the costs of the hearing before ROMER, J., which I think have not been dealt with, and any other general costs of the action. It seems to me that the delay in the redemption is entirely due, as was contended by counsel for the plaintiff, to a wrong claim by the defendant. It is quite true that it may have been a claim possibly supported by some authority which has now been overruled by the Court of Appeal and it was put forward possibly quite bona fide, but it is a claim which has completely failed. That claim has really been made on a wrongful basis and has been entirely responsible for the delay in redemption. Accordingly, as regards those general costs it seems to me that the plaintiff is entitled to have them, and there will, therefore, be an order in his favour to that extent. As regards the costs of the hearing before me the matter is more difficult because the right of the defendant to his interest has been contested. It seems to me that both sides have succeeded to some extent. It is rather difficult to make an exact apportionment. It is quite true that the interest was larger than the amount of the costs. On the whole I think the right order in regard to the hearing before me is that each side should bear its own costs.

PERRY v. DEMBOWSKI.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, L.J., Croom-Johnson and Romer, JJ.), May 3, 1951.]

Rent Restriction—Death of tenant—“Member of the tenant's family”—Reputed husband of tenant—Child of parties living as husband and wife—No de facto adoption of child by putative father—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

For some seven years the defendant and a Mrs. B., the statutory tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, had lived together in the house as man and wife until her death on July 9, 1950. They had one son who was born in 1946. The defendant remained in the house after her death. In an action by the landlord for possession of the house, the defendant claimed the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts on the ground that he was a “member of the tenant's family” within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), and that he had to reside at the house in pursuance of his duty to look after and bring up the child whom he proposed to adopt.

HELD: in the absence of evidence that the defendant had de facto adopted the child during the lifetime of the mother and had maintained it both while the mother was alive and after her death and intended to continue to do so, and was also trying to make the de facto position permanent by seeking to be allowed to adopt the child, or taking steps indicating such an intention, the defendant could not be treated as a "member of the tenant's family" within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (g).

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES, made at Brentford County Court, and dated Feb. 9, 1951, whereby he granted the landlord possession of certain premises to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied.

The county court judge held that the defendant, a man named Dembowski, who had been living with the statutory tenant of the premises, a Mrs. Bild, as her husband up to the date of her death, was not a member of her family within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g).

Figg for the defendant.

R. B. Willis for the landlord.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES who made an order for possession in respect of certain premises. The learned county court judge found that up to her death in July, 1950, a Mrs. Bild was the tenant of the premises in question. She started as a contractual tenant, but by reason of an increase in rent she had become, at the date of her death, a statutory tenant. In those circumstances the question arose whether there was anyone who could claim to be, within s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, a member of the tenant's family entitled to remain on after the death of the statutory tenant. On Mrs.

Bild's death the landlord claimed possession. In his particulars of defence the defendant said that in or about 1943 he began to live with Mrs. Bild and they lived together as man and wife until her death on July 9, 1950. They had one son who was born in 1946. The defendant contended that he was a "member of the tenant's family" within s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, and said further that he had to reside at the premises in pursuance of his duty to look after and bring up his child whom he proposed to adopt legally. It was admitted before us that he had not, so far, taken any steps to adopt the boy.

It was decided in Gammans v. Ekins (1) that a man who has been living with a woman tenant, they not being married, could not be held to be a member of the tenant's family within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (g), and, therefore, the landlord was entitled to possession. In that case there were no children of the union, and the court left open the question whether, if two unmarried persons have been living together and there are children of the union, on the death of the woman who is the tenant the survivor can claim as a member of the tenant's family within s. 12 (1) (g). It seems to me that if one is to distinguish this case on the ground that here there is a child, it must depend on the defendant's relationship to the child as putative father. At first I was inclined to think that the fact that the defendant had taken no steps to adopt the child, or, as, possibly, he might, to make himself the child's guardian, rendered it impossible to distinguish the present case from Gammans v. Ekins (1). I think, however, that this approach is somewhat too simple. As counsel for the defendant submitted, one has to consider the matter first of all in the light of the position as and when the tenant dies. It is clear that the law has recognised what is described as de facto adoption by a father of an illegitimate child. In those circumstances he will be held bound—I am quoting from the headnote in Cameron v. Baker (2)—

“to provide for the child himself, or to give the most distinct notice of his intention to pay such annual sum no longer.”

I will indicate the type of fact or circumstance in which, I think, the court might distinguish Gammans v. Ekins (1) and find that the father of an illegitimate child might be entitled to say that he came within s. 12 (1) (g). Obviously the question must be left to be decided when the sort of facts which I have indicated arise. If the defendant in the present case had led evidence to show that he ought to be treated as having de facto adopted the child during the lifetime of the mother, that he had maintained it both while the mother was alive and after her death and intended to continue to do so, and also was trying to make the de facto position permanent by, at any rate, seeking to be allowed to adopt the child or taking such other steps as indicated such an intention, he might be treated as a member of the family. The evidence in the present case falls short of what is required under both heads, namely, when one is considering the position at the time of the death and the failure to take any steps since. The defendant gave some evidence that he paid the rent, and he said he paid for a stove, but this evidence is of a most fragmentary kind which does not enable one to come to any clear conclusion as to his responsibility vis-a-vis either the mother or the child. The child has been away for reasons of health, the defendant said, since the death of the mother. The defendant said that he was looking after the child, but he did not say that he was paying for it. He said he was “fetching [the child] tomorrow.” In my view, this falls short of what would be required to show that the defendant had put himself in the position of having de facto adopted the child. One has to consider the state of circumstances at the date of the death, and the steps which the father takes after the mother’s death are a very important part of the picture, in my view, as indicating the position in which he then was. It is also relevant to consider as showing how, the mother having died, the father has, or has endeavoured to, put himself in a permanent relationship with the child. So far as that is concerned, the evidence is wholly against any such conclusion. I am not satisfied that this point was taken in this form before the county court judge. If it was not, that might be a fatal objection to it. Counsel for the defendant also argued, in the first instance, that we should consider the position of the child under s. 12 (1) (g). That, I think, is impossible. I am not saying that, when there are children, it may not be right and proper, if a guardian ad litem is appointed, to consider their position and their rights under s. 12 (1) (g), if any, in proceedings such as the present. The child is, however, not before the court, and the defendant is in no way in a position to represent it or to bind it by any judgment. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I am of the same opinion.

ROMER, J.: I agree.

Pictorial or sculptured representations of incidents in the Passion of Our Lord and known as the Stations of the Cross are not intrinsically unlawful.

Stations of the Cross may, however, be forbidden if they are likely to be put to improper uses or where there is a danger of their becoming the objects of superstitious reverence.

It is not unlawful to include among the Stations of the Cross representations of the falls or a representation of the legend of St. Veronica for which there is no scriptural authority, although it may be preferable to display the Gospel story without additions of a disputed nature.

Since Stations of the Cross are not in themselves unlawful, it is within the discretion of the court to grant or refuse a faculty for them, but it may be appropriate to limit the grant “until further order”.

PETITIONS for the grant of faculties.

In the case of St. Peter, St. Helier, Morden, the petition was for “a faculty for the purpose of hanging in Bishop Andrewes' Church [a chapel] a set of the fourteen Stations of the Cross in plaster relief.” The petitioners were the Rev. F. Livesey Godfrey, vicar of the mother-church of St. Peter; the Rev. J. A. Court, who, at the time of the filing of the petition, was the priest in charge of Bishop Andrewes' Church, but had since been succeeded by the Rev. Marshal McIntyre who himself supported the petition; and Mr. H. A. Baker and Mr. A. C. Wooden, the churchwardens. In the case of St. Olave, Mitcham, the petition was for “a faculty for the purpose of erecting a set of Stations of the Cross” and also for a memorial tablet inscribed: “The Stations of the Cross are dedicated to the glory of God and in memory of Harry John Andrew Rudolph, Vicar's Warden, 1928-1950.” The Stations were also fourteen in number and were executed pictorially in relief. The petitioners were the Rev. C. V. B. Haddelsey, vicar of the parish at the time when the petition was filed, since succeeded by the Rev. A. Duckett, who himself supported the petition, and Mr. F. E. Pailthorpe and Mr. J. R. Phipps, the churchwardens. The fourteen Stations of the Cross included, in each case, three pictures representing Our Lord falling on the way to Calvary and one picture representing the incident of the meeting with St. Veronica.

Hutchinson, K.C., Wigglesworth and Chavasse for the petitioners.

The petitions were unopposed.

THE CHANCELLOR: These are two similar petitions for faculties which for convenience and by consent have been heard together. In each case the petition received the unanimous support of the parochial church council. In neither case is there any opposition. In each case the proposal has received the approval of the diocesan advisory committee. In each case there are fourteen Stations of the Cross. Ten of them depict in the usual manner incidents in Our Lord's Passion recorded in the Gospels. Of the remaining four, as is often found, three represent Our Lord falling beneath the weight of the Cross and one depicts the well known story of Our Lord's encounter with St. Veronica.

In Bishop Andrewes' Church at the time of the hearing of the present petition the Stations had already been temporarily placed without a faculty on window sills for the purpose during Lent of holding the service known as "Devotions," and services are, in fact, held in the form set out in the well-known booklet published by W. KNOTT & SON, entitled "AN OFFICE FOR THE WAY OF THE CROSS." It is a sufficient description of that service to say that at each Station meditation on the scene depicted is first invited and prayers are offered up addressed to one of the Persons of the Trinity, the last prayer before each Station being: "May the souls of the faithful, through the mercy of God, rest in peace." There is no invocation of Our Lady or of the saints. Mr. McIntyre, the priest in charge of Bishop Andrewes' Church, stated in evidence that, apart from telling children that they would not find the incident of St. Veronica in the Gospels, he gave no teaching as to the historical basis either of that story or of the three falls and that children would go away with the impression that they were historical events.

In St. Olave's Church the Stations which are the subject of the petition have not been introduced, although they have been bought. Fourteen brown-paper crosses have, however, been affixed to the wall of the church and are utilised for the purpose of a service of much the same sort as in Bishop Andrewes' Church, the booklet used being HANKEY'S "STATIONS OF THE CROSS," stated to be arranged for private use and containing pictures of the fourteen Stations, but omitting any prayer for the souls of the faithful. With regard to the representation of the incidents concerning St. Veronica and the three falls, the vicar, Mr. Duckett, stated that his teaching concerning them is couched in the terms: "It is said that Jesus's face is wiped by Veronica," and, "It is said that Jesus fell." The only remaining facts which appear to me to be at all relevant are that both Mr. McIntyre and Mr. Duckett clearly regard the Stations as of value as an aid to devotion and that, from the evidence as to the services which are held in them, I should say that both churches would probably in current parlance be described as "rather high church."

Three main questions arise for determination, namely: (i) Are the proposed Stations aesthetically satisfactory? (ii) Can they, or any of them, be lawfully introduced into a church? And (iii) If the answer to the first two questions is in the affirmative, ought they, or any of them, to be so introduced in the circumstances of these particular cases?

The first question I can answer at once. Pictures of the Stations have been put in evidence. I am in agreement with the advisory committee and I hold that on purely aesthetic grounds the proposals are satisfactory.

The second question regarding their legality is far more difficult. I am bound to confess that, had I not been aware of the body of opinion to the contrary, it would never have occurred to me to doubt the legality of the ten Gospel Stations. Save during the period of puritanical excesses it has been customary to embellish churches with all sorts of decorations, both pictorial and sculptural, notably, but not exclusively, in the form of stained glass windows. The object of such decorations is a twofold one, namely, to give glory to God by beautifying His houses and as aids to devotion. A frequently recurring theme in such decorations is the representation of some scene in the life of Our Lord. It is true that such decorations, like almost everything, are capable of being abused, and the likelihood of abuse is a factor to take into consideration in deciding whether or

A not in any given case they ought to be introduced, but that matter falls to be considered as one of discretion and only after the question of legality has been decided. It is with the legality of such decorations that I am at the moment concerned, and, in general, I can see no ground for impugning their legality. Nor can I, on the point of legality, see any ground for differentiating between Stations of the Cross and any other pictorial or sculptured representations.

B It is often stated that Stations of the Cross are a post-Reformation innovation. Even if the statement were true, I do not see why that should be regarded as militating against their legality or even against their desirability, but, the statement that Stations of the Cross are post-Reformation is not wholly accurate. In one form or another they were known before the Reformation and counsel has reminded me that there was a set at Nuremberg in the fourteenth century.

C It is, however, true to say that in their present form and in the form in which they are proposed in the present applications they are post-Reformation and were in use in the Roman Church before it occurred to anyone to introduce them into a church of the Anglican Communion. In the Roman Church they have been used as a substitute for a pilgrimage to the actual Via Dolorosa in Jerusalem, and, because in the Latin Church (to use a term which in this context at least is

D common and preferable) the Franciscans are the guardians of the Holy Land, in post-Reformation times the Stations of the Cross were at first peculiarly associated with the Friars Minor though in recent years their popularity has been such that their use has spread far beyond the confines of places administered by the friars. Once again, however, on the question of legality, these considerations, though interesting, seem to me to be irrelevant. As I have had occasion to remark

E before, the fact that the Church of Rome does something is by itself no reason why the Church of England should not also do it. Indeed, in these days, when suspicion is less strong and there is what might be described as an oecumenical feeling in the air, one might have thought that the more one could find in common between the severed parts of Christendom the better. I emphasise that I am not at the moment considering the use to which these decorations are put by the F Roman Church or to which they might be put if introduced into these two English churches. I am considering merely the question of their intrinsic legality, and on this point, if the matter were free from authority, I should certainly hold that Stations of the Cross were lawful.

There is, however, a formidable volume of decided cases of such a nature as to cause the stock text-books to state that Stations of the Cross are not lawful.

G It is the contention of the petitioners that this conclusion of the text-books is wrong, and it is, therefore, necessary to examine the authorities in detail. The first in point of time and also the most important is Clifton v. Ridsdale (1), decided in the Court of the Arches, and, therefore, binding on me. The headnote to that case in the LAW REPORTS states that Stations of the Cross "are decorations forbidden by law in churches of the Church of England," and that summary of the decision has usually been regarded as correct. As counsel has pointed out, the case

H was not a faculty case. It was a case in which proceedings were brought against the Rev. Charles Joseph Ridsdale under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, in respect of a number of alleged unlawful acts of a varied nature, including the wearing of vestments, the mixing of water with wine, the use of wafer bread, the manner of conducting services, and the introduction of various articles into the church. The twelfth charge was in respect of the introduction without a faculty of a set of Stations of the Cross, "such as are commonly used in Roman Catholic churches." In dealing with this charge the learned Dean of the Arches (LORD PENZANCE) said (1 P.D. 359, 360):

"The first objection taken to them I must hold to be a fatal one, namely—that they constitute 'an addition to the fabric ornaments or furniture of the church' within the meaning of the statute, and have been set up in the church by the respondent 'without lawful authority,' no faculty having been either granted or applied for to justify their erection. The law which requires that those who wish to fix or set up any new decoration in a church must apply to the proper authorities for a faculty before they do so, is very salutary and ought to be upheld . . . It is upon this ground, therefore, that I shall order their removal."

I pause there to note that the objection which LORD PENZANCE found to be fatal to the Stations of the Cross was that they had been introduced without a faculty and it was on that ground that he ordered their removal. So far, no basis is given to the statement in the headnote that they "are decorations forbidden by law." Once the learned dean had stated that the ground on which he was ordering their removal was that they had been introduced without a faculty anything further which he said, though deserving the most careful study, was purely obiter and not of binding authority. His judgment, however, continued, and dealt with the allegation that they were decorations forbidden by law, and in respect of that allegation he said (ibid., 360): "as they now stand I think they are." In this connection he pointed out that neither the three falls nor the story of St. Veronica had any warrant in Gospel history and he further went on to discuss the use to which Stations of the Cross were put in the Roman Church, including the obtaining of indulgences. It is this part of the judgment which alone lends some support to the sweeping condemnation of Stations of the Cross contained in the headnote. On analysis I do not think, however, that LORD PENZANCE was any longer dealing with the question of the intrinsic legality or otherwise of Stations of the Cross. He was dealing with the third question which arises in all these cases, namely, whether in the circumstances of the particular case then before him the Stations ought, in fact, to be introduced. In this connection it is highly significant that the learned dean continued (ibid., 361):

"I shall, therefore, as I have above said, order their removal, leaving it open to the respondent, if he shall desire it, to apply for a faculty to authorise the introduction into his church of such of them as may turn out to be free from objection."

It seems to me, therefore, impossible to regard Clifton v. Ridsdale (1) as authority for the proposition that Stations of the Cross are necessarily and intrinsically unlawful and I do not think that that was what LORD PENZANCE intended to decide.

In Re St. Mark's, Marylebone Road. St. Mark's (Vicar) v. St. Mark's (Parishioners) (2) the Chancellor of London (DR. TRISTRAM, Q.C.) ordered the removal of a set of Stations of the Cross which, together with other things, had been introduced into the church "without a faculty, and contrary to the vote of the vestry and the wishes of the parishioners" and which the learned chancellor found had given the greatest offence to the parishioners and had been used superstitiously. I am for the moment concerned only with the question of the intrinsic legality or otherwise of Stations of the Cross, and, therefore, I reserve comment on the finding that the Stations had been used superstitiously. On the question of intrinsic legality that decision is no authority either one way or the other, and with its result, although it is not binding on me, on the facts of that particular case, I respectfully agree.

Davey v. Hinde (3) was also heard by CHANCELLOR DR. TRISTRAM, Q.C., this time in the Consistory Court of Chichester. In that case the chancellor ordered the removal of a set of Stations of the Cross although they were already in the church at the time of its consecration. Evidence was given of the type of service which was performed before these Stations. The chancellor said ([1901] P. 118):

“From the above evidence it is patent that the purpose for which the Stations of the Cross are in this church is to enable a service to be celebrated there, which is prescribed by and in use in the Church of Rome, but which is in contravention of the doctrines and practice of the Church of England. It is, therefore, imperative on the court, following the decision of the Arches Court and of the Judicial Committee in the Ridsdale case (1), to make an order for their removal.”

From this it seems to me to be clear that the learned chancellor was not purporting to decide the question of the intrinsic legality or otherwise of the Stations. He was ordering their removal because of the use to which they had been put.

In Markham v. Shirebrook Overseers (4) CHANCELLOR KEMPE, sitting in the Consistory Court of Southwell, made an order for the removal of fourteen Stations of the Cross which had been introduced into the church without a faculty. It does not, however, seem to me that at any point he decided that Stations were necessarily unlawful, or, indeed, that he ever seriously directed his mind to the question. The sole basis of his decision appears to be that in his judgment these particular Stations had been put to unlawful uses and were likely, if left, to be put to such uses again. That is an aspect of the case which calls for more detailed consideration, but on the question of intrinsic legality or illegality one receives no guidance from the decision which was founded on the learned chancellor's view that the uses to which these Stations had been put and were likely to be put were superstitious uses within the chancellor's understanding of the interpretation placed on that expression in Clifton v. Ridsdale (1).

Vincent v. St. Magnus the Martyr, etc. (Rector & Churchwardens) (5), began in the Consistory Court of London where CHANCELLOR ERRINGTON refused to grant a faculty for Stations of the Cross. His judgment was not reported. The case went to appeal on other points and the judgment of the Dean of the Arches (SIR LEWIS DIBDIN) on these other points is almost essential to a proper understanding of Clifton v. Ridsdale (1) and I shall return to it later, but the refusal of a faculty for Stations of the Cross was not appealed against and so was never the subject of a judgment in the Arches Court, and, therefore, it is not binding on me.

The last case which it is necessary to consider in connection with the legality of Stations of the Cross is Capel St. Mary, Suffolk (Rector & Churchwardens) v. Packard (6). In that case CHANCELLOR NORTH in the Consistory Court of St. Edmundsbury and Ipswich had ordered the removal of a number of objects from the church, among them a set of fourteen Stations which had apparently been put into the church without a faculty. On appeal to the Court of the Arches, counsel for the appellants, submitting that ten of the Stations might be retained, said ([1927] P. 295):

“It is admitted that a service has been used in connection with the Stations of the Cross, and that the presence of the three pictures for which there is no scriptural authority cannot be defended. The rector is prepared to undertake that no such service shall be held hereafter and to remove the said three pictures. It is submitted that the rest may remain.”

It is interesting in passing to note that only three and not four of the pictures were admitted to be without scriptural authority and I assume that counsel was submitting that there is scriptural authority for one fall. SIR LEWIS DIBDIN, however, in dealing with this submission, held that all fourteen should be removed and gave his ruling in the following words (ibid., 306):

“Fourthly, the Stations of the Cross, consisting of the whole series, including the St. Veronica picture. The rector admits that the services and instructions known as the Stations of the Cross are held and that lights are used ceremonially in connection with them. These pictures are illegal ornaments . . . ”

That is emphatic language, and the decision is binding on me. If it means that Stations of the Cross are necessarily illegal, that is an end of these present two cases. Furthermore, it would be entirely wrong for me, in the face of such language to accede to any argument to the contrary unless the most careful examination were to drive me to the conclusion that by these words the learned dean did not intend to rule that Stations of the Cross are necessarily and in all circumstances illegal. The context in which these words were used must, therefore, be scrutinised very carefully.

The first thing to note is that these articles had been introduced without a faculty and that the learned dean specifically refers to the manner in which they had been used. We are not, unfortunately, given much information in the report how exactly they had been used, but it is clear from the rest of the case that illegalities of one sort or another were rife in this particular church. In any event, if the dean had meant to rule that Stations of the Cross were intrinsically unlawful, the use to which they had been put was irrelevant and would not have been mentioned. The next thing to note is the list of three cases which the learned dean cited in support of his ruling. One of them was Re Christ Church, Ealing (7), which had nothing to do with Stations of the Cross as such and, in so far as it is relevant at all, is relevant with regard to the principles on which sculptured decorations are admissible. Another of the cases cited was Clifton v. Ridsdale (1), which, as I have said, is not, in my view, authority for the proposition that Stations of the Cross are necessarily illegal. In that case they had been introduced without a faculty and in so far as they came under further condemnation, they did so by reason of the use to which it was then thought they were likely in that particular case to be put, and it was expressly indicated that at a later date a faculty for some at least of the Stations might be sought. The third case cited was Markham v. Shirebrook Overseers (4) in which again, as I have indicated, in my view, the sole reason given for bringing the Stations under condemnation was because of the use to which it was thought they were likely to be put. Bearing in mind these matters and how important it is not to divorce judicial pronouncements from their context, I have come to the conclusion that when in the Capel St. Mary case (6) SIR LEWIS DIBDIN said ([1927] P. 306): “These pictures are illegal ornaments,” he did not intend to rule for all time against Stations of the Cross as such (which would constitute a departure from the attitude of LORD PENZANCE in Clifton v. Ridsdale (1)), but intended merely to indicate that in the circumstances of the particular case then before him the retention of these Stations could not be sanctioned—in other words, if the learned dean had been sharply distinguishing, as I am, between the question of the intrinsic legality or otherwise of such articles and the question whether in the particular case they ought to be permitted, while he would have answered the latter question in the negative, it by no means follows that he would so have answered the former question. After the most careful consideration, and, I hope, in complete loyalty to the decisions of the Court of the Arches, I am of the opinion that the Capel St. Mary case (6) on examination is not an authority for the proposition that Stations of the Cross are intrinsically illegal.

I have now reviewed all the cases cited to me on this question of intrinsic legality or illegality and I do not find anything which binds me to hold that such articles are intrinsically unlawful. I, therefore, continue in the opinion at which I had arrived without recourse to the decided cases and I hold that Stations of the Cross are not in themselves unlawful.

I turn, then, to the third question, namely, whether in the particular cases now before me these Stations or any of them ought to be introduced, and this involves the question whether, if they are introduced, they are likely to be put to improper uses, or, to employ the technical language forced on me, whether there is danger of their becoming the objects of superstitious reverence. I have no doubt that, if these Stations are permitted to be introduced as permanent or semi-permanent additions to these two churches respectively, they will continue to be used as in the one case they have hitherto been used and as in the other case the brown-paper crosses have been used. They will continue to be used like that, at any rate so long as Mr. McIntyre and Mr. Duckett are each at his respective church. Services will be held in which at each Station meditation will be invited on the scene depicted and the prayers contained in the two little booklets, to which I have referred, will be offered to the Almighty. It is also probable that private individuals will make their private devotions in much the same way. In addition, the roaming eye of the casual observer will sometimes alight on one or more of these representations and sometimes a meditation on the scene depicted may flow therefrom. Furthermore, the churches will be embellished by these additions. Is there anything in all this to which exception can be taken?

It is, I think, necessary to consider this question first with regard only to the ten Gospel Stations, leaving out of account the representations of the three falls and of the story of St. Veronica. I have considered the two little booklets most carefully. The booklet entitled "AN OFFICE FOR THE WAY OF THE CROSS" contains the prayer for the souls of the faithful, which I take to mean the faithful departed, and in some quarters exception might be taken to such a prayer, but I hold that there is nothing therein contrary to the doctrine or law of the Church of England and I need cite no further authority for that than the Capel St. Mary case (6) ([1927] P. 306). Apart from that prayer there is nothing to which even the most censorious could take exception simply in the actual language of the devotions contained in these booklets. CHANCELLOR KEMPE in Markham v. Shirebrook Overseers (4) ([1906] P. 254, 257) seems to have regarded the prospect of private devotions as being peculiarly suspect, but only, I think, because he thought that all devotions in that particular church would be tainted by superstition, but I am quite sure that the prayers in the two booklets which I am considering could be recommended for private devotion as being wholly in accordance with the doctrine of the Church of England.

If, then, as I hold, these devotions are of such a character that they may be employed by any loyal Anglican privately, do they assume a different character if they are used as a service in a form of public worship? The answer, I think, is that in themselves they remain unobnoxious. Their use in public worship, however, might be challenged on another ground, in that the minister who takes the service, if a clerk in holy orders, might be guilty of a breach of the declaration required by canon 36 and also by the Clerical Subscription Act, 1865, namely, in public prayer to use the form prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer "and none other, except so far as shall be ordered by lawful authority." No one, not even in the House of Lords, knows what these words mean: see LORD DAVEY'S observations in Rossi v. Edinburgh Corpn. (8) ([1905] A.C. 29). The memorandum of VAISEY, J., "LAWFUL AUTHORITY" (to be found in THE CANON LAW OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, p. 215) is sufficient for me. Let it suffice to say that, since the wording of these devotions is doctrinally unobnoxious, they could properly be ordered by lawful authority (whoever or whatever that is in these particular cases) for use in public prayer. There can, therefore, be no reason on this ground why I should withhold a faculty. If hereafter any clerk in holy orders should use this or any other form of public prayer not ordered by lawful authority, there are proceedings of a different nature by which he can be restrained.

There still remains the question whether these devotions, unobnoxious in themselves, are to be viewed differently if they are performed either before a single Station or in sequence before each of the Stations in turn. Do they thereby partake of the nature of the worshipping or adoration of images contrary to the twenty-second article of religion, and, therefore, come under condemnation as superstitious reverence? In ordinary parlance they clearly do not. No one could for a moment imagine that anybody would attach the slightest sanctity to any of these representations themselves. I have, however, to interpret this unfortunate expression, "superstitious reverence," in the light of what LORD PENZANCE said about it in Clifton v. Ridsdale (1). He said (1 P.D. 352) that it

"by the use of the words 'superstitious reverence,' 'adoration,' or 'worship' to convey only the limited idea of a figure or object itself worshipped like a pagan idol. On the contrary, I understand these expressions as intended to embrace the far more extended conception of worship, adoration, or reverence paid to the deity in presence of or before those objects or figures. It may not be easy to push definition further than this, and define what it is that in any, or every case, constitutes adoration or worship in presence of an image or figure; nor is it necessary to do so; it is enough for the purpose in hand to say that it must be taken to include all and every form or degree in which the object in question is made to take a place, or play a part, in the devotions which are paid to the deity before it."

Those are hard words and, so far as I am concerned, binding words. Were they really intended to dub with the taint of superstition every act of devotion inspired by and in the presence of some pictorial or sculptural memorial of our faith? I do not think so. As CHANCELLOR KEMPE observed in Markham v. Shirebrook Overseers (4) ([1906] P. 255), all pictorial representations must necessarily serve the purpose of reminding observers of the events portrayed. If so narrow a construction were placed on LORD PENZANCE'S words, it would be impossible to have a crucifix at the place where confessions are wont to be made, a practice for which there is now ample authority, including the judgment of SIR LEWIS DIBDIN in the Capel St. Mary case (6) ([1927] P. 302). LORD PENZANCE himself in Clifton v. Ridsdale (1) obviously found it difficult to put into words exactly what he meant, as the passage quoted shows. He certainly intended to rule that the error of superstition could be manifested by acts which fell short of the actual adoration of an image. To attribute to an image any intrinsic sanctity would probably fall within the scope of his condemnation. So, probably, would also the belief that any special grace flowed from the doing of an act in the presence of an image. Thus, he would have condemned as superstitious the Roman teaching with regard to the indulgences to be gained by performing devotions in the presence of Stations of the Cross, but he would not, I think, have wished to be taken to condemn the use of a picture for the purpose of putting the worshipper in mind of something upon which a meditation may profitably be made. Whatever may have been the case in the nineteenth century or in any of the authorities which have been cited, I am completely satisfied that in the cases before me the sole purpose for which these Stations are intended and to which they are likely to be put is, as CHANCELLOR KEMPE would have said, the one they must necessarily serve, namely, that of reminding observers of the events portrayed, with the wholesome result of stimulating meditation on those events. I, therefore, hold that there can be no valid objection to the ten Gospel Stations.

The non-scriptural ones, however, require further consideration. Nor are they all on an equal footing with each other. They have this in common, that none is recorded in the Bible. That in itself can clearly not be conclusive. There are many undoubted historical facts which are nowhere recorded in the Scriptures. A more serious objection to the four Stations which I am now considering is that the historicity of the events depicted is doubtful. Even that is not necessarily fatal. If it were, we could have in our churches no representation of St. George killing the dragon or of St. Christopher carrying the infant Christ. The real difficulty is that these four Stations, non-scriptural and of doubtful historicity, are presented on terms of apparent equality with the ten Gospel Stations, and, therefore, might be taken to have received the sanction and to convey the authoritative teaching of the Church.

This is a serious objection. It is necessary to see how serious. Counsel has pointed out that, whereas the authorised version of the Bible in Mark, c. 15, v. 22, reads "And they bring him unto the place Golgotha," the Greek reads, "καὶ φέρουσιν αὐτὸν ἐπὶ Γολγοθα τοπὸν" and φέρω always implies the idea of carrying. If that does not suggest that Our Lord fell, it certainly suggests that He required support and was stumbling. It is for this reason, I suppose, that my learned predecessor, SIR WILLIAM HANSELL, felt able to grant, as I am told he did, a faculty for Stations which included one, but not more than one, fall. I find it difficult, however, to swallow the camel of one fall while straining at the gnat of more than one fall. If it is conceded that Our Lord was stumbling and in need of support, it does not seem to me to matter very much precisely how that is represented pictorially. Were it to be represented as a continuous sequence in the form of a religious play or film, instead of, as here, in what I believe are known as "stills" from such a sequence, I do not think that any serious point would be taken as to the number of times Our Lord was represented as falling, and counsel tells me that the pre-Reformation Stations at Nuremberg contain representations of seven falls.

These arguments, however, cannot be applied to the representation of the incident of the meeting with St. Veronica which rests solely on tradition. Counsel has ingeniously argued that it quite likely happened, that at the worst it is an edifying story, and that at the best it is true. This argument, I think, refers only to the meeting and not to its sequel, the miraculous imprint of Our Lord's features on the cloth with which in the case of both the sets of Stations under consideration it is clearly linked, for in both sets the miraculous imprint is depicted. I do not presume to pass judgment on the veracity or otherwise of these stories. The Church of England gives no authoritative teaching either way on the matter. The question here, as with the representations of the falls, is whether it is right for such things to be displayed in the context of the Gospel story as though they were on the same authoritative level as the other incidents depicted. I am bound to say that I have been much exercised by what the answer should be. On the one hand, I should very much prefer to see the Gospel story unfolded pictorially in all the grim simplicity of the scriptures without additions of a disputed nature. On the other hand, I am loath, even indirectly, to interfere with the teaching functions of the clergy to whom that responsibility is entrusted, unless the teaching in question is clearly contrary to the teaching of the Church. I am also aware that the full set of fourteen Stations is nowadays to be found throughout the world in churches outside the Church of England, but within the Anglican communion as well as in churches of the Roman communion. I am reluctant to do anything, in however small a matter, which would appear to create yet another point of obligatory differentiation between the Church of England and other branches of Christendom. In the result, although only with great hesitation, in the present two cases I have decided not to place a veto on any of these four non-scriptural Stations. In reaching this conclusion I am influenced in part by the form in which I propose to make the order which will provide some check on the manner in which the Stations are used, and I am also partly influenced by the fact that there has been no opposition, archidiaconal or parochial, to these petitions which would seem to indicate that in responsible quarters no fears are entertained and in the parishes no sentiments are outraged.

I, therefore, decree that in each of the cases a faculty shall issue in the full form as prayed, but I further decree that this shall be only until further order. I do not anticipate any abuse of these Stations, but a decree in this form provides a useful additional safeguard should conditions in the future change. It is, I am told, a form of order which commended itself in this court to CHANCELLOR HANSELL and it has received the emphatic approval of the Dean of the Arches (SIR LEWIS DIBDIN) in the St. Magnus the Martyr case (5) ([1925] P. 18). Where, as here, the major part of the expenditure has already been incurred, there can be no objection to such an order and, on many grounds, much to commend it.

I wish to add just this. CRIPPS ON CHURCH AND CLERGY, 8th ed., at p. 237, includes Stations of the Cross among the ornaments which are "without question" illegal, and that is a view which has been very widely shared, though, if it is right, it places under condemnation many good Anglicans and the many churches where Stations are now to be found. Out of deference to this view, however, I have thought it necessary to examine the whole matter very fully and to give my reasons at considerable length. I believe that the conclusion at which I have arrived will be found to be in accordance with the authorities when carefully examined, and I am strengthened in that view by the knowledge that in recent years other chancellors have sometimes found it possible to permit the introduction of Stations of the Cross, though their decisions have not reached the reports. I think that one of the chief reasons why it has been so widely thought that Stations of the Cross are illegal is because two questions have tended to become confused, namely, whether or not they are intrinsically illegal and whether or not they are in any given case likely to be put to illegal uses. As I have said, an examination of the decisions has led me to the conclusion that it has never been authoritatively decided that Stations of the Cross are intrinsically illegal, and in the two cases before me I am satisfied that they are not likely to be put to illegal uses. It is, therefore, a matter for my discretion whether or not faculties should issue. In the exercise of that discretion I have decided that in these two cases faculties may issue. It does not follow that on other applications and in different circumstances I should exercise my discretion in the same way. Nor is it surprising that in the present two cases, in the twentieth century, I should have exercised my discretion more readily and more favourably than courts were wont to do in the nineteenth century. Circumstances are very different now from then, and the courts were probably wise in their generation to move cautiously. We must not, however, mistake the cautious use of their discretion in something which concerns merely the trappings of religion for an authoritative and immutable ruling on a matter of principle. The basic principles which guide the Church are unchanging. Within the framework of those principles, the Church in her wisdom adapts herself and her trappings to ever changing conditions. She is the Body of Christ, and the Body of Christ is not a mummy. It is a living organism. It is not a mummy, held together only by the restricting folds of a winding-sheet which permit of no further changes than those wrought by slow decay. It is a living organism requiring freedom to grow and move, and, when the clothes of yesterday no longer fit, it is as well to discard them. The reformers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries had no doubt of this, and we in the twentieth century should bear it in mind when interpreting the decisions of the nineteenth century. They must never be considered out of the context of the conditions in which they were reached. This is nowhere more clearly stated than by the Dean of the Arches (SIR LEWIS DIBDIN) in the St. Magnus the Martyr case (5) ([1925] P. 11, 12). It is in accordance with my understanding of what was there enunciated that I have based my decision.

Legacy Duty—Exemption—“Event” occurring after commencement of Finance Act, 1949—Instalments of legacy duty falling due—Ascertainment of residuary estate—Finance Act, 1949 (c. 47), s. 27 (2), (e).

By his will a testator, who died on Dec. 1, 1946, gave certain annuities to commence from the date of his death and directed his trustees to appropriate investments and retain the income thereof to answer them. The investments were appropriated as so directed on Jan. 30, 1947 (i.e., before the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27, came into operation on July 30, 1949). The testator devised his real estate and the residue of his personal estate to his trustees on trust for conversion and to pay his debts and the usual expenses and the legacies bequeathed by his will. The trustees were directed to invest the residue and hold such investments on trust to pay out of the income thereof £800 per annum to I.M.G., and subject thereto the testator declared trusts in favour of other persons, all of whom were chargeable at the same rate of legacy duty as I.M.G. The administration of the estate was not completed before July 30, 1949, and there was no retainer for the benefit of the residuary legatees prior to that date. Legacy duty was claimed on the value of the annuities and on the capital value of the residuary estate.

HELD: (i) on the appropriation on Jan. 30, 1947, legacy duty became payable in accordance with the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, s. 8, in respect of the annuities for which the appropriation was made, and the annual payment of instalments of the legacy duty was not an “event” within the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27 (2), which, if occurring after July 30, 1949, would render the relevant annuity exempt from duty by virtue of the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27 (1).

(ii) although until the residue was ascertained in due course of administration the residuary legatees had no right to any particular assets forming part of the estate, the ascertainment of the residuary estate was merely an administrative matter not affecting the title of the residuary legatees, and, therefore, particularly in view of s. 27 (3), the ascertainment of the residue was not an “event” within s. 27 (2) of the Act of 1949, and the residue was not exempt from legacy duty under s. 27 (1).

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, having regard to the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27, and in the events which had happened, certain annuities and the residuary estate bequeathed by the testator were exempt from legacy duty. The testator died on Dec. 1, 1946, but the residuary estate had not been ascertained before, and some instalments of legacy duty in respect of the annuities fell due after, July 30, 1949, when s. 27 of the Act of 1949 came into operation.

Cyril King, K.C., and Jackson Wolfe for the executors.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

DANCKWERTS, J.: The question which I have to decide depends on the operation of the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27. That section, speaking quite generally and possibly inaccurately, abolishes the burden of legacy duty in respect of events happening after the commencement of Part III of the Act. That important date was July 30, 1949.

The testator, the provisions of whose will are material, died on Dec. 1, 1946, and his will was proved on Feb. 22, 1947. The administration of his estate does not appear to have been fully completed even at the present time. The residuary estate has not been ascertained, and so had not been ascertained before July 30, 1949. The testator's will is dated Apr. 24, 1939, and there is also a codicil dated May 17, 1940, which is immaterial, except that an additional executor was added, and the codicil confirmed the terms of the will. The testator, who left a considerable estate, by his will gave a large number of pecuniary legacies. He then bequeathed a number of annuities free of all duties to commence from the date of his death and directed his trustees to retain the income of investments appropriated to meet the annuities as they fell due. In the case of each of the annuities he directed his trustees to appropriate out of his personal estate in their names certain sums of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. consols which he mentions, and he declared that the income from the respective funds directed to be appropriated should in each case be the primary source for answering the respective annuity to which it related and the capital of the said funds should form the secondary fund for answering the same in the event of the income proving insufficient,

"and further that after any such appropriation shall have been made my residuary estate or the income thereof shall no longer be liable to provide for the annuity in respect of which such appropriation shall have been made."

Finally, he devised and bequeathed

"all my real and the residue of my personal estate not hereby or by any codicil hereto otherwise disposed of unto my trustees [on trust for conversion and] Subject to the payment of my debts funeral and testamentary expenses legacies and any duties payable on any legacies bequeathed free of duty by this my will or any codicil hereto I direct that my trustees shall invest in manner hereinafter authorised the proceeds of the said sale calling in and conversion with power from time to time to vary such investments and shall stand possessed of such investments and all such parts of my estate as shall at my death consist of such investments as aforesaid [his residuary trust fund] upon the following trusts . . . Upon trust to pay out of the income thereof the sum of £800 per annum to Iva Muriel Gibbs so long as she remains the widow of the late Harold Vivian Gibbs."

There follows a trust to pay the remainder of the income of the residuary trust fund and a trust to pay the whole of the income of the residuary trust fund after the death or re-marriage of the said Iva Muriel Gibbs to the children of the late Harold Vivian Gibbs in equal shares for their respective lives, and then a trust on the death of any of the said children, a bachelor or a spinster, to pay the income of the part of the residuary trust fund to which such deceased child was entitled to the survivors of the said children in equal shares and on the death of any of the said children while married or having been married on certain further trusts as to the capital of such part of the residuary trust fund to the income of which such child was entitled during his or her life.

The Finance Act, 1949, s. 27, on which the case turns, provides:

“(1) Legacy duty and succession duty shall not be chargeable on a legacy derived from a testator or intestate dying after the commencement of this Part of this Act or on a succession conferred after that commencement, nor on any other legacy or succession in so far as the duty would apart from this section be payable in connection with any such event as is mentioned in the next following sub-section. (2) The events referred to in the foregoing sub-section are any of the following events happening after the commencement of this Part of this Act, that is to say—(a) the death of any person; (b) the determination or failure of any charge, estate, interest or trust; (c) the exercise of a power of appointment; (d) the making of any payment or the application of any property, if the duty would apart from this section be chargeable—(i) under s. 11 of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, or under that section as applied by s. 32 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853 (which deal with benefits of uncertain amount receivable from time to time); or (ii) under s. 25 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853 (which deals with premiums for the renewal of a lease or the grant of a reversionary lease); (e) any other event which, under the provisions of the relevant will or disposition or the rules governing the distribution of the intestate's estate, affects the right to the legacy or succession or to the enjoyment thereof or which changes the nature of the property comprised therein or any part of that property. (3) The reference in sub-s. (1) of this section to duty being payable in connection with an event shall, in relation to legacy duty, include its being payable when the legacy is paid, delivered, retained, satisfied or discharged in connection with that event, and for the purposes of this section the expression ‘legacy’ includes residue and share of residue.”

The contention of the executors in the present case is that, while the testator's death occurred some time before July 30, 1949, either a retainer or some other occurrence of that type has occurred or must necessarily occur after July 30, 1949, and, consequently, legacy duty is not payable in respect of the benefits in question received under the testator's will. The terms of s. 27 (2) of the Act of 1949 are the same as the provisions to be found in the Finance Act, 1947, s. 49 (3). That section was passed for the purpose of imposing additional legacy duty in the case of deaths or events happening on or after Apr. 16, 1947. The same arguments which might in the present case be put up to secure exemption from tax might conceivably have been put forward on that section (while it was material) on behalf of the Inland Revenue to secure a further burden of legacy duty.

The Legacy Duty Act, 1796, s. 6, provides:

“And . . . the duties hereby imposed, shall in all cases in which it is not hereby otherwise provided, be accounted for, answered and paid by the person or persons having or taking the burthen of the execution of the will or other testamentary instrument, or the administration of the personal estate of any person deceased, upon retainer for his, her or their own benefit, or for the benefit of any other person or persons, of any legacy or any part of any legacy, or of the residue of any personal estate or any part of such residue, which he, she or they shall be entitled so to retain either in his, her or their own right, or in the right or for the benefit of any other person or persons, and also upon delivery, payment or other satisfaction or discharge whatsoever of any legacy or any part of any legacy, or of the residue of any personal estate or any part of such residue, to which any other person or persons shall be entitled.”

The section further provides for the case where the retainer is either for the benefit of the person in question or for the benefit of other persons. Section 8 provides:

“ And . . . the value of any legacy given by way of annuity, whether payable annually or otherwise, for any life or lives or for years determinable on any life or lives, or for years or other period of time, shall be calculated and the duty chargeable thereon shall be charged according to the tables in the schedule hereunto annexed, and the duty chargeable on such annuity shall be paid by four equal payments, the first of which payments of duty shall be made before or on completing the payment of the first year's annuity, and the three others of such payments of duty shall be made in like manner successively before or on completing the respective payments of the three succeeding years annuity respectively; and the value of any such annuity, if determinable upon any contingency besides the death of any person or persons, shall be calculated without regard to such contingency: Provided always, that if any such annuity shall determine by the death of any person before four years payment of such annuity shall become due and payable, then and in such case the duty shall be payable in proportion only to so many of the payments of the said annuity as actually accrued and became due and payable . . . ”

Section 12 provides for the calculation of duty according to the appropriate rates.

In the present case, as all the persons were related within the same degrees for the purposes of legacy duty, it is plain that, so far as residuary estate is concerned, the duty will be calculated on the capital value, but there is a provision which I ought to read at the end of s. 12 which deals with that particular case and is as follows:

“ . . . and all and every person and persons who shall become absolutely entitled to any such legacy or residue or part of residue so to be enjoyed in succession shall, when and as such person or persons respectively shall receive the same or begin to enjoy the benefit thereof, be chargeable with and pay the duty for the same or such part thereof as shall be so received or of which the benefit shall be so enjoyed, in the same manner as if the same had come to such person or persons immediately on the death of the person by whom such property shall have been given to be enjoyed or in such manner that the same shall be enjoyed in succession.”

As regards the annuities, other than the annual sum of £800 a year which was to be paid out of the residuary trust fund, it appears that on Jan. 30, 1947, an appropriation was made to the respective annuities as was provided by the terms of the will. It seems to me, therefore, that in the case of the annuities the argument that an event occurred after the material date, July 30, 1949, could not succeed because the appropriation on Jan. 30, 1947, had caused legacy duty to become payable in respect of annuities to be calculated in accordance with the provisions of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, s. 8. Counsel for the executors contended, however, that an event occurred on the anniversary of the testator's death, that is to say, on Dec. 1 in each year on which a new amount (as I understood his argument) became payable in respect of each annuity, and in the case of the first four years one set of instalments of legacy duty became payable. Accordingly, in each successive year fresh events occurred within the meaning of s. 27 of the Act of 1949, and so, at any rate in the case of those events, as he described them, which occurred after July 30, 1949, there was an event which caused exemption, so far as material, under the provisions of s. 27. It seems to me that that is not treating an annuity according to its true nature. An annuity does not accrue (at any rate since the Apportionment Act, 1870) once a year. It accrues from day to day. If the annuitant dies in the middle of one of the appropriate years his estate does not lose the whole benefit of that year's annuity.

It receives a proportionate part of it. As was held by SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in Scholefield v. Redfern (1), the gift by will of an annuity of £400 a year is not a gift of a series of legacies of £400 payable at the end of each year. Therefore, it seems to me that that argument ignores the true nature of an annuity. So far as the provisions of s. 8 of the Act of 1796 are concerned and the proviso which provides for relief from further legacy duty or part of the legacy duty in the case of the annuitant dying before the expiration of four years from the death of the testator, those were simply provisions for relief in what was conceived to be a case of hardship, and, in my view, do not affect the true construction of the provisions of the section. Accordingly, as regards the annuities, in view of the appropriation which was made prior to July 30, 1949, the claim to exemption under s. 27 of the Act of 1949, must fail.

I turn to the trusts of the residuary trust fund, including the provision for the payment of the annual sum of £800 to the widow of Harold Vivian Gibbs, the testator's nephew. The argument as put forward against the claim of the revenue in this respect was that one cannot say that there is any right or claim to the residuary estate or to the enjoyment of it until the residuary estate is ascertained by process of administration. Until that event occurs all that the persons interested in the residuary estate have, according to law, is a right to have the estate of the testator or intestate duly administered. Therefore, when finally the residuary estate is ascertained, and still more when the executors assent to the trusts of the residuary estate and so put off the character of executors and assume that of trustees with the consequences which ensue, such as, for instance, the result which occurred in Attenborough v. Solomon (2), there is a change in the rights and title and position of the persons who are beneficially interested in the residuary estate. That has been laid down by the House of Lords and other courts in a series of cases, notably Lord Sudeley v. A.-G. (3); Barnardo's Homes v. Income Tax Special Comrs. (4) and Corbett v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5), from which it appears that until the residuary estate has been ascertained by administration the beneficiaries entitled under the trusts of the will cannot claim that they have any right to any particular assets forming part of the testator's estate, nor that the income which may be acquired by the executors in respect of the residuary estate is in any way the income of the beneficiaries, at any rate for the purposes of income tax. Expressions have been used by certain of the learned Lords dealing with the matter which go as far as saying that until ascertainment the residuary estate has no existence. Therefore, it is said on behalf of the executors in the present case, that until ascertainment there is no right to the residuary estate, and the ascertainment of the residuary estate is an "event" within the meaning of s. 27 of the Act of 1949. Consequently, there was here an event which happened after the appropriate date, and the section applies to the whole of the residuary estate and the beneficial interests which arise in respect of it.

That argument receives some support from the terms of the testator's will where the whole of his real estate and the residue of his personal estate is given on trust for conversion and to pay the liabilities and legacies previously given, and, finally, to invest. Then, and not until then, is there created under the trusts of the will something which is called by the testator "my residuary trust fund," and the benefits which the beneficiaries are to get under the clauses in the will which are now material relate only to that residuary trust fund and to nothing else. Therefore, it is said, until the residuary trust fund is ascertained there has not occurred the event on which the beneficiaries become beneficially entitled to their interests. That argument seemed to me at one time to have considerable attraction, but I think, when one comes to examine carefully the terms of s. 27, that is not the kind of event which is there described. In the first place, sub-s. (2), which defines the events which are referred to in sub-s. (1), enumerates a number of things which are not administrative events, though whether the term which was used by counsel for the Crown, viz., "actual events," is quite accurate, I am not sure, but, at any rate, they are events, as it seems to me, of a different kind from the mere completion of the administration of the estate. Again, when one turns in particular to para. (e) of sub-s. (2), which is the most important one for the present purpose,

“any other event which, under the provisions of the relevant will or disposition or the rules governing the distribution of the intestate’s estate, affects the right to the legacy or succession or to the enjoyment thereof or which changes the nature of the property comprised therein or any part of that property,”

I think it is evident, as was contended by counsel for the Crown, that that paragraph refers to matters which are not administrative, but affect the beneficial interests of persons concerned either under the provisions of the relevant will or under the rules governing the distribution of an intestate’s estate.

It was hardly necessary to cite authority for the proposition that in the case of an intestacy there is a distinction between the rules governing the distribution and the rules which govern the administration of the estate. I think that the distinction in the case of an intestate’s estate in para. (e) must be deliberate. I think that the references to the provisions of the relevant will or disposition are again references to the beneficial provisions which one finds in the will or disposition and do not include the administrative requirements and rules which the law imposes in regard to a particular estate or trust. Notwithstanding the argument which was put forward by counsel for the executors that one must read into the will all that the law would apply or imply, apart from that which one finds set out expressly in the will, it seems to me that the title of the residuary legatee to a residuary estate remains the same both before and after the completion of administration notwithstanding that it is not until it is complete that he can say that any particular asset or any particular income is his and not merely part of the general estate of the testator. When I turn to sub-s. (3) which refers back, not to sub-s. (2), but to sub-s. (1), it seems to me that the argument which was put forward by counsel for the Crown that the administrative act was not an event within the meaning of the section is plainly right. It would have been easy for the legislature, if they had so intended, to say that the reference to duty being payable in connection with an event should be a reference to duty being payable in connection with the payment, delivery, retainer, satisfaction, or discharge of the legacy. That would have brought in the rules about payment which are contained in the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, but that is not what the sub-section says. The sub-section refers to the duty being payable in connection with the event. Then, when s. 27 deals in sub-s. (3) with delivery and retainer, the words are

“shall, in relation to legacy duty, include its being payable when the legacy is paid, delivered, retained, satisfied or discharged in connection with that event . . .”

In other words, the event is something different from the delivery, retainer, satisfaction, discharge or payment.

Accordingly, it seems to me that that sub-section does not support the contentions which have been put forward on behalf of the executors. In the result, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the event which is material in the present case was the death of the testator, and the death of the testator occurred before July 30, 1949. Therefore, it seems to me that legacy duty will be payable in connection with the residuary estate in due course, including the annual sum of £800 a year which is given on trust for the widow of the testator’s nephew, and that the claim to exemption is not made out.

Order accordingly.

Re DULLES' SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. DULLES v. VIDLER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., and Denning, L.J.), May 2, 3, 10, 1951.]

Court—Jurisdiction—Submission to jurisdiction—Claim resisted on ground of court's lack of jurisdiction.

On May 28, 1946, the father, an American citizen, obtained a decree of divorce in the French courts against the mother, who subsequently brought the infant child of the marriage to England to reside. The father later obtained an order in France awarding him custody of the infant. On Feb. 6, 1948, an action was brought by the infant (by his mother as next friend) against his maternal grandparents claiming to become a ward of court. On June 28, 1948, the infant (by his mother as next friend) took out a summons in the action asking for the mother to be given the custody of the infant and also that provision be made for his maintenance. No direct claim was made on the father for maintenance, but (although he was not a party to the action) a copy of the summons was sent to the father's solicitors. At the hearing of the summons the father, who was then living in the United States of America, contested the mother's claim for custody, but custody was awarded to the mother. The father also opposed any order for maintenance being made against him on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to make such an order, and he took the further objection that the infant and not the mother had made the application. At first instance the father's contention was upheld, but the infant's appeal was allowed, the Court of Appeal holding that the English courts had power to order maintenance against the father if he had voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction in that respect. On the question whether the father had so submitted,

HELD: the father had not fought the claim for maintenance on the merits, and had not, by his technical objection as to parties, submitted to the jurisdiction on that claim; nor had he done so by contesting the claim for custody, because (a) that claim was distinct from that for maintenance and submission in relation to one claim would not amount to submission in relation to the other, and (b) in so doing he was merely seeking to protect the order for custody which he had obtained in France; and, therefore, the court could not order him to maintain the infant.

Harris v. Taylor ([1915] 2 K.B. 580), explained and distinguished.

Per DENNING, L.J.: If the claim on the father for custody and maintenance had been made by originating summons to which the father was a party, leave to serve him out of the jurisdiction could have been given under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 8A (b) (1). If the claim had been made by writ by which the father was made a party to the proceedings, leave to serve him out of the jurisdiction could have been given under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (g). In either case, there having been proper service, the court would have had jurisdiction to make the order asked.

APPEAL by an infant (by his mother as next friend) against an order of ROMER, J., dated Mar. 6, 1951.

In an application by the infant for an order that the mother be awarded custody of the infant and for an order directing the father to provide proper maintenance for the infant the father contested the claim for custody, and on the question of maintenance submitted that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order against him, an American citizen not residing within the jurisdiction. ROMER, J., upheld the father's submission on the question of maintenance. The Court of Appeal held ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1013) that the court could order the father to maintain the infant provided that he had submitted to the jurisdiction. The question of submission was referred to ROMER, J., who rejected the contention that the father by his conduct had submitted voluntarily to the jurisdiction.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 10. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: In this case I have had the advantage of reading the judgment about to be delivered by DENNING, L.J., and, agreeing with him in his conclusion that the appeal fails and with the reasons for his conclusion, I will confine myself to but few observations. The question is whether, on the plaintiff's application for an order for maintenance under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, of which application notice was given to the defendant's solicitors, the defendant, who is an American citizen resident at all material times outside the United Kingdom and is the father of the plaintiff, has submitted to the jurisdiction of the High Court—i.e., voluntarily rendered himself amenable to the court's jurisdiction. There can be no doubt that from the first, consistently and vigorously, he has protested against the jurisdiction, and no other question on the application for maintenance has yet been canvassed by the court. ROMER, J., before whom came each of the three hearings of the matter prior to the case coming on the last occasion before the Court of Appeal, and who, therefore, heard all that was said on behalf of the father, held that he had not so submitted himself. In those circumstances I should be most reluctant to hold that the father, nevertheless, by some tactical or other false step, must be taken, contrary to his avowed intention, voluntarily to have cut the ground from under his feet, but it is just that that counsel for the plaintiff says that the father has done.

The proceedings out of which the question arises are of an essentially informal character. The action is one by writ to administer the trusts of the settlement to which the father is no party. The object, according to well-established Chancery practice, was to make the infant a ward of court. In accordance with the same practice the plaintiff, an infant, by his mother as next friend, has issued an ordinary summons not inter partes asking that orders be made (i) for custody and (ii) for maintenance of the infant. There are no pleadings which formulate the issues. Affidavits were filed by the mother, and I understand by others on her side, constituting the evidence in support of the application under both heads. To such evidence the father, having made it plain that he was only concerned to challenge the right of the mother to an order for custody and that on the question of maintenance he protested against the jurisdiction of the court, put in evidence in reply.

The first point taken by counsel for the infant is that the father could not participate in the mother's claim to custody without also accepting the jurisdiction of the court to make an order against him for maintenance. I do not agree. I think the two matters are in essence, as is pointed out by DENNING, L.J., distinct. Then it is said that since the mother's evidence covers indiscriminately the question of custody and maintenance, the father, by his answer, involved himself in the question of the merits of the application for maintenance as well as the question of the merits of the application for custody. It is, of course, plain that where a question of jurisdiction arises a man cannot both have his cake and eat it. He cannot fight the issue on the merits, and at the same time preserve the right to say, if the worst comes to the worst, that the court has no jurisdiction to decide against him, and he cannot, consistently with that principle, take any step unequivocally referable to the issue on the merits. I agree with ROMER, J., that the passages in the affidavit fastened on by counsel for the infant cannot, taken at the highest in his favour, be regarded as so unequivocal.

A It is further said that the father argued the question of the construction of the statutes which was recently decided in this court, and further argued the point that, since the application for maintenance was made, not by the mother, but by the infant, it was outside the purview of the Acts. In my judgment, those questions were in the circumstances merely alternative grounds for protesting the jurisdiction, and the former was, indeed, only separated from the present question because this court, for reasons to which I will return, decided on the former occasion to limit its decision as it did. In Harris v. Taylor (1), to which I will later refer, the defendant's motion to set aside the service of the proceedings on him as being in excess of the jurisdiction of the Manx court was based on three grounds. I cannot think that the defendant's failure to establish any one of those grounds could have been suggested as having been fatal to the others.

C Finally, it is said that the father's proper course was to take out a summons to stay the proceedings quoad the claim for maintenance. I agree with the learned judge that such an application would, in the circumstances, have been wholly inappropriate and futile as a proceeding. Since on any view the court's powers under the Acts to order maintenance depended on the condition that it had first made the order for custody, it is clear that such an application would have been stood over until the latter question had been determined, and so the court would have arrived precisely at the present situation.

I have said that the proceedings are properly of an informal character, and questions of substance ought to be decided and to be capable of being decided without recourse to formalities. I regret that, as things have turned out, two excursions to this court have been necessary, and that in the end no order can be made on the father to pay the infant's costs of the last excursion. I regret it the more since, as ROMER, J., justly pointed out, the material for the decision of the present question was all before this court on the last occasion. I venture, however, to observe that on that occasion our attention was drawn to language in the judgment then under appeal in which the learned judge expressed regret at the conclusion he had reached on the construction of the statute and which seemed to indicate that he might otherwise have made the order he was asked to make, and there was, moreover, some divergence of recollection between learned counsel on what had occurred before the learned judge. It was for those reasons that this court thought it best to refer the matter back. In conclusion, I add a sentence or two on Harris v. Taylor (1). I agree with DENNING, L.J., that that case can only be regarded as deciding that the matter of jurisdiction had, on the facts of the case, become res judicata between the two parties to it. As such it is, of course, binding on this court. Its correctness may, however, fall at some time to be considered in the House of Lords, for, as I understand the principles of private international law applied in these courts, a foreign judgment can be treated as so conclusive only if inter alia it was pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction, and the question of the court's competence will prima facie,

G

H I should have thought, be open to the consideration of our own courts. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J., read the following judgment. On Dec. 23, 1930, in Paris, Mrs. Dulles, an Englishwoman, married her husband, who was an American then domiciled in France. On May 5, 1940, a son was born to them. On May 28, 1946, the husband obtained in the French courts a decree of divorce against the wife. On Sept. 5, 1947, the mother brought the child to England and she has remained here with him ever since. The father afterwards obtained an order from the French courts giving him the custody of the child, but this order has never been put into operation, because on Feb. 6, 1948, an action was brought in England in the Chancery Division by the infant (by his mother as his next friend) against his maternal grandparents claiming to become a ward of court. On June 28, 1948, the infant (by his mother as his next friend) took out a summons in that action asking for the mother to be given the custody of the child and also

“that such provision may be made for the maintenance of the said infant as to this court may seem meet.”

A copy of that summons was sent to the father's solicitors and they acknowledged it. It is to be noted that in that summons no direct claim was made on the father for maintenance. He was no party to the action, and he was only given notice of the application so that he could attend if he wished. The father himself had by this time gone back to America. He is a very rich man and is said to have assets in England worth £40,000.

When the summons came on for hearing the father, by his counsel, attended and strongly contested the wife's claim for custody, relying on the order which he had obtained from the French courts, but, nevertheless, the wife was awarded the custody. The judge must have been of opinion that that was best in the interests of the child: see Re B.'s Settlement (2), McKee v. McKee (3). So far as maintenance of the child was concerned, the father by his counsel vigorously opposed any order for maintenance being made against him. He said that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order against him. The judge upheld this view, but the Court of Appeal reversed his decision, holding that the English courts had power to order maintenance against him if he had voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction in that respect: see Re Dulles' Settlement Trusts (4). The Court of Appeal, therefore, referred the case back to the judge to see if the father had submitted to the jurisdiction. The judge has held that the father has not submitted to the jurisdiction and I agree with his decision. I cannot see how anyone can fairly say that a man has voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction of a court when he has all the time been vigorously protesting that it has no jurisdiction. If he does nothing and lets judgment go against him in default of appearance, he clearly does not submit to the jurisdiction. What difference in principle does it make, if he does not merely do nothing, but actually goes to the court and protests that it has no jurisdiction? I can see no distinction at all. I quite agree, of course, that if he fights the case, not only on the jurisdiction, but also on the merits, he must then be taken to have submitted to the jurisdiction, because he is then inviting the court to decide in his favour on the merits, and he cannot be allowed, at one and the same time, to say that he will accept the decision on the merits if it is favourable to him and will not submit to it if it is unfavourable. But when he only appears with the sole object of protesting against the jurisdiction, I do not think he can be said to submit to the jurisdiction: see Tallack v. Tallack & Broekema (5) ([1927] P. 222) per LORD MERRIVALE.

It may be said that in this case the father did more than protest against the jurisdiction, because he contested the issue of custody, but in that respect he was only seeking to protect the order for custody which he himself had obtained in the French courts. That is not sufficient to amount to a submission to jurisdiction on the maintenance claim. So, also, it is said that he did more than protest against the jurisdiction, because he took the technical objection that the application was not made by the mother: see [1950] 2 All E.R. 1019, 1020; but that was not an objection on the merits. It was another objection going to jurisdiction and was not sufficient to amount to a submission to the jurisdiction.

Harris v. Taylor (1) appears at first sight to conflict with the views I have expressed, but a careful examination of that case shows that it is distinguishable. The plaintiff there sued the defendant in the Isle of Man for a tort committed there. The defendant was not in the island, but the Manx court gave leave to serve him out of the jurisdiction of the Manx court on the ground that the cause of action was founded on a tort committed within their jurisdiction. The defendant entered a conditional appearance in the Manx court and took the point that the cause of action had not arisen within the Manx jurisdiction. That point depended on the facts of the case, and it was decided against him, whence it followed that he was properly served out of the Manx jurisdiction in accordance with the rules of the Manx court. Those rules correspond with the English rules for service out of the jurisdiction contained in R.S.C., Ord. 11, and I do not doubt that our courts would recognise a judgment properly obtained in the Manx courts for a tort committed there whether the defendant voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction or not, just as we would expect the Manx courts in a converse case to recognise a judgment obtained in our courts against a resident in the Isle of Man on his being properly served out of our jurisdiction for a tort committed here. Harris v. Taylor (1) is an authority on res judicata in that the defendant was not allowed in our courts to contest the service on him out of Manx jurisdiction, because that was a point that he had raised unsuccessfully in the Manx court, and he had not appealed against it. To that extent he had submitted to the jurisdiction of the Manx court and was not allowed to go back on it, but the case is no authority on what constitutes a submission to jurisdiction generally.

Relieved of Harris v. Taylor (1), I think it plain that the father here did not voluntarily submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in regard to the claim for maintenance. He appeared and protested vigorously against it. It would be contrary to the facts to say that he submitted to it. That is sufficient to decide the only issue which this court on the last occasion referred back to the judge, but I desire to point out that no application was made in this case to make the father a party to the proceedings or to serve him out of the jurisdiction under the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (g), or r. 8A (b) (1). If it had been, I think that an order for maintenance might well have been made against him. Take the case of the English wife of an American, who is deserted by him and left here with a child and no means to maintain it, while the father goes off to America leaving assets here. If she brings a petition in a matrimonial cause, she can serve her husband out of the jurisdiction without leave: see the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 9. She can properly include in her petition a claim for custody and for maintenance of the child, and the Divorce Court would, undoubtedly, have jurisdiction to order him to pay maintenance for it. I see no reason why the Court of Chancery should not in its own sphere exercise a like jurisdiction. It could be done in one of two ways: (i) If a claim on the father for custody and maintenance were made by originating summons, he would have to be a party to the summons and leave could be given to serve him out of the jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 8A (b) (1). (ii) If the claim on him for custody and maintenance were made on the writ in an action to make the infant a ward of court and to execute the trusts of a settlement, the father would be a proper party to those proceedings, and leave could be given to serve him out of the jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (g). In the present case, however, no such procedure was gone through. The father was not made a party to the proceedings. He was only given notice of a summons which did not make any claim on him at all. That is quite insufficient to found a jurisdiction under Ord. 11. That is a good reason why this court on the last occasion said that the judge would only have jurisdiction to order maintenance if the father voluntarily submitted to the court having jurisdiction in the matter. I take it to be clear that, if a child is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, it has power to order custody to the mother and maintenance against the father under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, even if the father is resident outside the jurisdiction, but it is essential that the father should be a party to the proceedings and should either be served here or be served out of the jurisdiction under

Ord. 11, or voluntarily submit to the jurisdiction. None of that has been done. The appeal, therefore, fails. I must say that I regret it, because it only fails on a technicality. I would willingly overcome it if I could, but I do not see how to do it, having regard to all that has happened. The process of the court can only be exercised against a person who is properly made a party to the proceedings and is properly served.

Appeal dismissed.

FRANCIS JACKSON DEVELOPMENTS, LTD. v. HALL AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Hodson, L.JJ., and Lloyd-Jacob, J.), April 30, May 10, 1951.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Whole of dwelling-house sub-let furnished—Notice to quit by head landlords to expire on Dec. 11, 1950—Notice to quit to sub-tenant to expire on Dec. 9, 1950—Application by sub-tenant to rent tribunal on Dec. 7, 1950—Action for possession commenced by head landlords on Dec. 13, 1950, while sub-tenant in occupation under statutory security of tenure—Application of doctrine in Prout v. Hunter—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 11 (2) (a).

Rent Control—Application—Validity—Misnomer of landlord—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 1096), reg. 3 (2), as amended by Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) (Amendment) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1763), reg. 2.

On Aug. 5, 1949, H., the tenant of a dwelling-house which was subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts, granted a furnished sub-tenancy of part of the house, retaining the rest of the house for herself. On July 24, 1950, the tenancy of the house was transferred from H.'s name into that of her mother, T., who had been living with her, but H. continued to live there and to manage the house on behalf of T. On Nov. 11, 1950, as a temporary measure for the convenience of the sub-tenant, H., on behalf of T., granted to the sub-tenant a furnished tenancy of the whole house, and H. and T. went to live elsewhere, with a clear intention of returning. On learning that the whole house had been sub-let, the head landlords determined the tenancy by a notice to quit, dated Nov. 28, 1950, to expire on Dec. 11, 1950. H., in her own name, then gave the sub-tenant notice to quit, dated Nov. 30, 1950, to expire on Dec. 9, 1950. On Dec. 7, 1950, the sub-tenant made an application to the rent tribunal to fix a reasonable rent and for security of tenure, H. being named as the landlord in the application. On Dec. 13, 1950, while the sub-tenant was still in occupation of the house pending the determination of his application by the rent tribunal, the head landlords commenced an action for possession against T. and H. They contended inter alia that the doctrine of Prout v. Hunter ([1924] 2 K.B. 736), applied, and that they were entitled to possession as the whole house was sub-let furnished on the date of the commencement of the action. T. and H. contended (a) that the sub-tenant was a trespasser when the action was commenced, his application to the rent tribunal being a nullity, as it named

H. instead of T. as the landlord, and (b) that, even if he were not a trespasser, the contractual sub-tenancy had expired on Dec. 9, 1950, and, therefore, the doctrine of Prout v. Hunter (supra), did not apply.

HELD: (i) the Minister of Health, in making regulations under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, had no power to impose formal conditions of validity on an application to a rent tribunal, as the Act itself required none, and, therefore, the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949, reg. 3 (2), as amended by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) (Amendment) Regulations, 1950, reg. 2, must be construed as directory and not imperative; accordingly, it was immaterial that the sub-tenant, in his application to the rent tribunal, had given H.'s name instead of that of T. as landlord, particularly as he had always regarded H. as the landlord and the notice to quit was in H.'s name; and, therefore, the application was effective and gave to the sub-tenant security of tenure under s. 11 (2) (a) of the Act of 1949, until the application was heard or withdrawn, and the sub-tenant was lawfully in occupation on Dec. 13, 1950, when the head landlords commenced the action for possession against T. and H.

(ii) where the sub-tenant of the whole of a furnished house made an application to a rent tribunal under s. 11 of the Act of 1949 the effect of s. 11 (2) (a) was not to extend the contractual tenancy as such, but only to give the sub-tenant a statutory security of tenure as against the tenant and during this statutory security the house was not sub-let furnished so as to bring the doctrine of Prout v. Hunter ([1924] 2 K.B. 736), into play, as that doctrine applied only to contractual sub-lettings, and therefore, as the contractual sub-tenancy expired on Dec. 9, 1950, the tenancy was within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts on Dec. 13, 1950, when the action was commenced, and the landlords' claim for possession failed.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES, made at Uxbridge County Court, and dated Feb. 13, 1951, dismissing an action for possession of premises to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied.

H
The defendants in the action were the tenant, Mrs. Tagg, and her daughter, Mrs. Hall, the tenancy having been in Mrs. Hall's name until July 24, 1950, and Mrs. Hall continuing to manage the house for her mother thereafter. The defendants, who had granted a furnished sub-tenancy of the whole house, served a notice to quit on the sub-tenant to expire on Dec. 9, 1950, after receiving a notice to quit from the head landlords to expire on Dec. 11, 1950. The sub-tenant thereupon made an application to the rent tribunal to fix a reasonable rent and for security of tenure, and on Dec. 13, 1950, while he was still in occupation of the house pending the determination of his application by the rent tribunal, the head landlords commenced an action for possession against the defendants, basing their claim on, inter alia, the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), and sched. I, para. (d), viz., that the defendants had sub-let the whole house without the landlords' consent and it would be reasonable to make an order. The county court judge held that, in the circumstances of the case, it would not be reasonable to make an order and dismissed the action, but, in a note made by him after the judgment, he stated that, in his opinion, Prout v. Hunter ([1924] 2 K.B. 736), (to which he had no access during the hearing) covered the case, and, accordingly, he thought that his judgment was erroneous. On an appeal by the landlords to the Court of Appeal, the defendants contended (a) that the application by the sub-tenant to the rent tribunal was a nullity, as the name of the landlord was wrongly inserted therein, and, therefore, the sub-tenant was a trespasser when the action was commenced, and, alternatively (b) that the doctrine of Prout v. Hunter (supra) had no application to the case, as it applied only to contractual tenancies, and, when the action against the defendants was commenced, the sub-tenant was in occupation of the premises not under a contractual sub-tenancy, but only under s. 11 (2) (a) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949.

May 10. DENNING, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. The plaintiffs are the owners of No. 120, Burnham Avenue, Ickenham, Middlesex. The defendants, Mrs. Hall and Mrs. Tagg, are members of a family which have occupied the house for twelve years at a rent of 18s. 6d. a week plus rates. On Aug. 5, 1949, Mrs. Hall, who was then the tenant, let part of the house furnished to a sergeant in the United States Air Force, named Perkins, at a rent of £5 a week, but she continued to live in the rest of the house herself. On July 24, 1950, the tenancy of the house was transferred from the name of Mrs. Hall into the name of her mother, Mrs. Tagg, but Mrs. Hall continued to live there and do all the business connected with the house on behalf of her mother. In the autumn of 1950 Sergeant Perkins wanted more room in the house because his wife was expecting a baby, so Mrs. Hall, on behalf of her mother, let him take over the rest of the house furnished on his paying an extra £1 a week, and Mrs. Hall went temporarily to live elsewhere. This new arrangement started on Nov. 11, 1950, and Sergeant Perkins on that day paid Mrs. Hall £12, being two weeks' rent in advance at the new rate of £6 a week. When the head landlords heard that Sergeant Perkins had taken over the whole house, they immediately gave Mrs. Tagg and Mrs. Hall notice to quit. They determined the tenancy by a notice to quit, dated Nov. 28, 1950, to expire on Dec. 11, 1950. Thereupon Mrs. Hall, on behalf of her mother, did all she could to rectify the position. She gave Sergeant Perkins notice to quit. The notice to him was dated Nov. 30, 1950, to expire on Dec. 9, 1950. If Sergeant Perkins had obeyed that notice, Mrs. Hall and her mother could have gone back into the house just in time before their own tenancy expired on Dec. 11, 1950, and there is no doubt that they would then have been protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. Sergeant Perkins, however, soon showed that he did not intend to comply with the notice. He offered to pay the rent of £6 a week, but it was refused. Then he went to his solicitors (who were, incidentally, also the solicitors acting for the head landlords) and they took steps to protect him in his occupation. They made an application to the rent tribunal to fix a reasonable rent and for security of tenure. This application was made on Dec. 7, 1950, just two days before the notice to quit to him expired. The application named Mrs. Hall as the landlord, no doubt because she was the only one whom Sergeant Perkins knew in the matter. If that application was effective, it meant that Sergeant Perkins had security of tenure at any rate until the rent tribunal heard his application: see the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 11 (2) (a). The solicitors, having thus, as they thought, made Sergeant Perkins secure, then acted in their other capacity as solicitors for the head landlords, the plaintiffs. They issued a plaint in the county court against Mrs. Tagg and Mrs. Hall claiming possession of the whole house on the ground that it had been let furnished to Sergeant Perkins without the knowledge or consent of the head landlords. The head landlords did not make Sergeant Perkins a defendant because, as they frankly admitted, they intended to let him stay there. If they got an order against Mrs. Hall and Mrs. Tagg, they intended to let the house to Sergeant Perkins unfurnished. It is important to notice that it was never suggested that Mrs. Hall and Mrs. Tagg had gone finally out of possession themselves. They had only gone temporarily so as to help Sergeant Perkins in a difficulty in which he found himself. They had left their furniture there, and some of their clothes. They also retained the key of the outside shed. They had a clear intention to return. It was not a case, therefore, where they had lost the protection of the Acts under the doctrine of Skinner v. Geary (1). That point was, indeed, not taken in the court below, nor in this court.

The claim for possession was put in the court below principally on the ground that the tenant without the consent of the landlords had sub-let the whole of the dwelling-house, and that it was reasonable to make an order: see the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), and sched. I, para. (d). The judge found that she had so sub-let it without their consent, but he dismissed the claim because in all the circumstances (which he carefully investigated) it would not be reasonable to make an order for possession. The judge's finding on that point was not challenged in this court. At the hearing of the appeal before us the head landlords sought to gain possession on a ground where reasonableness does not matter, namely, on the ground that the whole house was sub-let furnished on Dec. 13, 1950, when they commenced the action. That point was taken before the judge, but he was not referred to any of the authorities and he rejected it. When he looked into the matter afterwards, he thought that he ought to have ordered possession. He made a note after the judgment in which he said:

"On subsequent reflection, and on a reference to the authorities (there is no library at the court), I have now come to the conclusion that the foregoing judgment is wrong in law. I had overlooked, and my attention was not drawn to, Prout v. Hunter (2). If that authority had been before me, I should have held that it completely covered this case."

On reading that note, we called on counsel for the defendants and asked him if he could support the judgment which was pronounced. He then sought to support it, as he was entitled to do, on the ground that the house was not sub-let furnished on Dec. 13, 1950, when the head landlords commenced this action, and that, therefore, Prout v. Hunter (2) did not apply. He said that the contractual sub-tenancy to Sergeant Perkins had expired on Dec. 9, 1950, four days before the landlords brought their action for possession, and that thereafter the house could not be said to be sub-let furnished, notwithstanding the application made by Sergeant Perkins to the rent tribunal. He put his argument in two ways.

The first contention of counsel for the defendants was that on Dec. 13, 1950, Sergeant Perkins was a trespasser. He said that the application by Sergeant Perkins to the rent tribunal on Dec. 7, 1950, was a nullity, because it named Mrs. Hall as the landlord instead of Mrs. Tagg. He said that every tenant who applies to a rent tribunal for security of tenure must, at his peril, comply with all the regulations made by the Minister of Health* under the provisions of the Act of 1949, and, in particular, the tenant must specify the name and address of the landlord and all other matters which are set out in the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 1096), reg. 3 (2), as amended by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) (Amendment) Regulations, 1950

* By the Transfer of Functions (Minister of Health and Minister of Local Government and Planning) (No. 1) Order, 1951 (S. I., 1951, No. 142), art. 3 (1) and sched., Part I, the functions of the Minister of Health under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, were transferred to the Minister of Local Government and Planning, as from Jan. 30, 1951.

(S.I., 1950, No. 1763), reg. 2. If the tenant failed to specify in his application any of the matters required by the regulations, as, for instance, if he failed to specify the name of the landlord or his address, or specified them wrongly, counsel contended that the application would be a nullity and the tenant would not have the security of tenure given by s. 11 (2) (a) of the Act of 1949. We cannot accept that contention. Take this very case. Mrs. Hall was the only person whom Sergeant Perkins knew in the matter. She managed the house on behalf of her mother. She let it to Sergeant Perkins and she gave him notice to quit in her own name. Counsel for the defendants admitted that the notice to quit in her name was good, but said that the application to the tribunal was not. We are quite sure that Parliament did not intend any such thing. The Act of Parliament does not require an application to a rent tribunal to be in any prescribed form. It contemplates that applications under the Act will often be made by tenants who have no lawyers to advise them and no regulations by their side, and for this very reason it does not prescribe any formalities. It gives the Minister power to make regulations with regard to proceedings before rent tribunals, and that, no doubt, includes power to give directions as to the form which applications should take, but the Minister has no power to impose formal conditions of validity on an application when Parliament itself has required none. The regulations must, therefore, be construed as directory and not imperative, for otherwise the Minister would be exceeding his powers. So construed, it follows that an application to a rent tribunal is not a nullity, even though the name of the landlord was wrongly given. The application of Sergeant Perkins on Dec. 7, 1950, was, in our opinion, an effective application under s. 11 of the Act of 1949, and gave him security of tenure until the application was heard or withdrawn. Accordingly, he was lawfully in occupation on Dec. 13, 1950, when the head landlords brought this action for possession.

The second contention of counsel for the defendants was that the doctrine of Prout v. Hunter (2) applies only to contractual furnished sub-tenancies, and that in this case, the contractual sub-tenancy having expired on Dec. 9, 1950, the house was not thereafter sub-let to Sergeant Perkins so as to bring the principle of Prout v. Hunter (2) into play. He said, quite correctly, that the right of Sergeant Perkins to occupy the house after Dec. 9, 1950, arose, not from any contract of letting by Mrs. Tagg or Mrs. Hall, but only from s. 11 (2) (a) of the Act of 1949. Sergeant Perkins thenceforward occupied the house against the will, and without the consent, of Mrs. Tagg and Mrs. Hall, as much as if he had been a trespasser. It would be strange if they should lose the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts by his manoeuvre. In answer to this argument counsel for the head landlords points out that s. 11 (2) (a) of the Act of 1949 says that, on an application to a rent tribunal, "the notice to quit . . . shall not . . . have effect before the determination of the application" and he contends, therefore, that the furnished sub-letting continued. We agree that, if the words of s. 11 (2) (a) of the Act are given their literal meaning, it would seem that the house was still sub-let furnished on Dec. 13, 1950, because, owing to the statute, the notice to quit had not then taken effect. We are quite sure, however, that Parliament did not mean Prout v. Hunter (2) to operate in those circumstances, for the result would be that, owing to the furnished sub-letting, a head landlord would be able, as soon as his common law right to possession arose, to evict, not only the head tenant, but the sub-tenant also. In this particular case the head landlords have said that they do not intend to evict Sergeant Perkins, but the fact remains that they would have the legal right to do so. The result would be, therefore, that by reason of Sergeant Perkins' application for security of tenure, all the tenants, including Sergeant Perkins himself, would lose their security of tenure. We do not think that we should adopt a construction of the Act which would produce a result so opposed to the intention of Parliament. If the literal interpretation of a statute leads to a result which Parliament can never have intended, the courts must reject that interpretation and seek for some other interpretation which does give effect to the intention of Parliament: see Seaford Court Estates, Ltd. v. Asher (3) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 164). This can be done here by holding that, when a sub-tenant of the whole of a furnished house applies to a rent tribunal under s. 11 of the Act of 1949, the effect is, not to extend the contractual sub-tenancy as such, but only to give the sub-tenant a statutory security of tenure as against the tenant. During the period of this statutory security, the house is not sub-let furnished so as to bring the doctrine of Prout v. Hunter (2) into play, because that doctrine only applies to contractual sub-lettings.

In our opinion, therefore, Prout v. Hunter (2) does not cover this case. The judgment which the judge gave at the trial was correct and should be affirmed. We were told that the rent tribunal have given Sergeant Perkins security of tenure until May 11, 1951, only. He will then have to leave, and Mrs. Tagg and Mrs. Hall will resume occupation, as they would have done on Dec. 9, 1950, if he had complied with the notice to quit. They will thus keep the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

ROGERS v. HYDE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Asquith of Bishopstone, Birkett, L.J., and Lloyd-Jacob, J.), March 19, 20, May 10, 1951.]

Rent Restriction—"Separate dwelling"—Letting of rooms with "licence to use kitchen"—Declaration in agreement that tenancy to be within the Rent Acts.

As part of the terms of settlement of an action for possession brought by the owner of a house within the Rent Restrictions Acts against the statutory tenant of the premises it was agreed that the tenant was to give up her tenancy of the whole house and should be granted a weekly tenancy of part of it and that the owner and the tenant were to have joint use of the bathroom and certain other parts of the house which were not essential living accommodation. It was also provided that the tenant was to have "licence to use scullery (kitchen) at all reasonable times," and there was a declaration that the tenancy was to be within the Rent Acts. The owner having sold the house to the plaintiff subject to the tenant's rights, the plaintiff gave the tenant notice to quit, and sued for possession.

HELD: (LLOYD-JACOB, J., dissentiente): by providing that the tenancy should be within the Rent Acts the parties to the agreement could not of their own volition oust or reduce the jurisdiction of the courts to grant orders for possession, and, as the grantee of a licence to use a kitchen differed only in name from the grantee of a right to "share" or use it in common with the landlord, the tenant was not the occupier of a separate dwelling so as to be entitled to the protection of the Acts, and the plaintiff was entitled to possession.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE HAMILTON, made at Coventry County Court, and dated Jan. 22, 1951, whereby he granted to the landlord possession of certain rooms let to the tenant.

A. W. M. Davies for the tenant.

R. E. Megarry for the landlord.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 10. LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE (read by BIRKETT, L.J.): This is the tenant's appeal against a decision of His Honour JUDGE HAMILTON in the Coventry County Court granting the landlord possession of certain rooms in a house (75, Allesley Old Road, Coventry) owned by the landlord. These rooms are within the limits of rateable value covered by the Rent Restrictions Acts. Possession was granted on the footing that the rooms were, nevertheless, not protected by the Act, because not "let as a separate dwelling." The appeal raises afresh the hydra-headed problem whether and in what circumstances the Acts fail to protect a tenant because the letting of certain rooms to the tenant for his exclusive use is accompanied by the grant of a right to use some other essential living room in common with someone.

The facts are hardly in dispute. In June, 1940, the tenant became the contractual tenant of the whole dwelling-house from its then owner, one Cleaver. She remained so for five years, when Cleaver served a notice to quit. On its expiration the tenant became a statutory tenant. Cleaver, who wanted the house for his own occupation, sued for possession. The proceedings came on before the county court judge at Coventry on July 23, 1945. According to a practice then not uncommon, the proceedings were adjourned in the hope of a compromise, with liberty to either party to apply, and (whether by order of the court or otherwise) an interim modus vivendi was brought into operation whereby Cleaver was to share the house or part of it with the tenant. Cleaver moved in, occupied certain rooms for himself, but "shared" the use of the kitchen with the tenant. I will defer for the moment my apologia for using the discredited expression "share." This arrangement (to call it by a neutral name) lasted for nearly four years. In April, 1949, Cleaver wanted to get possession of the whole house, and, in pursuance of the liberty to apply, restored the case to the list. Between 1945 and 1949 a number of cases had been decided which may well have encouraged Cleaver to suppose that the sharing arrangement which obtained during that period would entitle him to obtain possession. However, the case was again adjourned for terms, if possible, to be agreed. Agreed in the end they were, and embodied in a document of Apr. 11, 1949. This is the crucial document in the case. These terms, so far as relevant, are as follows:

"(1) Present action to be withdrawn upon following terms . . . (3) Miss Hyde to be granted weekly tenancy of part of house at 75, Allesley Old Road, Coventry . . . (5) Mr. and Mrs. Cleaver to have sole use of front bedroom and front sitting-room. (6) Parties to share: (a) Cupboard on stairs and boxroom. (b) To have joint use of bathroom, w.c., hall, pantry, 'bogey-hole' and garage . . . (9) Miss Hyde to have licence to use scullery (kitchen) at all reasonable times. (10) Mr. and Mrs. Cleaver to pay rates. Miss Hyde's tenancy to be within Rent Acts."

A few months later Cleaver sold the house to Rogers, the present landlord, who bought it subject to the presence of the tenant there. He stepped, in effect, into Cleaver's shoes. That situation persisted till January, 1951, when, having given a notice to quit, the landlord sued for possession on the ground that there was in existence a "sharing" arrangement, and hence the premises were not "let to the tenant as a separate dwelling."

A The whole case, in my view, turns on the construction of the terms of the settlement of Apr. 11, 1949. There is no doubt that the tenant was a statutory tenant just before July, 1945. There was at certain stages in these proceedings some debate whether the tenant was divested of that character by what I have called the modus vivendi of 1945-49, with its de facto sharing of the kitchen. I do not think it matters whether during that period the tenant was a statutory tenant or not. In either case the possession from Apr. 11, 1949, on was governed by the instrument of that date. If the preceding tenancy was contractual, this is obvious. If it was a statutory tenancy, there is recent and binding authority for the proposition that a contractual (and non-protected) tenancy can replace a statutory tenancy by a notional surrender and re-grant or by other means: see, B for instance, Foster v. Robinson (1), a case recently decided by the Court of Appeal.

The question is what the terms of settlement of Apr. 11 mean. Do they, on their true construction, provide for a "sharing" of the kitchen in the pejorative sense of the word "share"? If they do, the tenant is unprotected, for the law, even since Baker v. Turner (2) and the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) C Act, 1949, seems to me to leave intact the proposition that where a landlord confers on a tenant the right to use in common with himself an essential living room, for example, the kitchen, the tenant is not the tenant of a dwelling-house "let as a separate dwelling." I will deal with Baker v. Turner (2) more fully in a minute. In using the term "sharing" in this connection I have been careful to enclose it in inverted commas to show I am not unmindful of the strictures which D LORD PORTER, in Baker v. Turner (2), has passed on its misleading implications. I have, nevertheless, retained it, because it is so inveterately embedded in the Neale v. Del Soto (3) set of decisions that it is difficult to dislodge or to replace with any paraphrase of comparable brevity.

To return to the "terms" of Apr. 11, 1949. Two points stand out in relation to these terms. First, by No. 10 of them, the parties are attempting by a contractual provision to bring the house within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. This, in my view, they cannot do. Parties cannot of their own volition oust or reduce the jurisdiction of the courts to grant orders for possession. Secondly, the draftsman is clearly familiar with the Neale v. Del Soto (3) series of cases and is trying so to frame his terms as to effect a "sharing" without divesting the house of any protection it may enjoy under the Acts. He realises E that under the decisions the kitchen is, but that neither the bathroom, w.c., nor garage is, an "essential living room"; he realises that one can safely "share" the latter, but not the kitchen. He, therefore, provides that the bathroom, w.c., and garage shall be shared, or used in common, but is careful, in relation to the kitchen, (a) to avoid expressions such as "share" or "use in common with," (b) to employ the word "licence" instead, and (c) to deal with the kitchen and G the rights or liberties conferred in respect of it in a clause of the instrument which is in form self-contained and segregated from the corresponding provisions in respect of the bathroom, etc.

The first point to be determined is whether the grant by the landlord in respect of the kitchen of a right deliberately not described as one of "sharing" or of "joint or common user," but described as a "licence to use . . . at all reasonable times", distinguishes the case from the Neale v. Del Soto (3) type of case, and leaves it open to the tenant to claim the protection which in the Neale v. Del Soto (3) type is excluded. In other words, is the right given to a tenant in a Neale v. Del Soto (3) case something which differs from, and exceeds, a licence (I mean for this purpose a licence irrevocable for the term of the lease of the rooms exclusively let, for a licence determinable earlier will presumably create no "sharing")? There is no doubt that in some of the cases a distinction is drawn between these two things, "sharing" and "licence." A good example is the county court decision in Rainger v. Kerrison (4). This case, though not technically binding on this court, is a carefully reasoned decision, to be treated with respect. There seems to have been a lease to a tenant of premises which included a kitchen, subject to a licence given by the tenant to the landlord, simultaneously, to use the kitchen. The county court judge held (a) that the terms of the letting, not the de facto arrangements as to the subject-matter let, governed the legal position quoad the Rent Restrictions Acts, and (b) that the licence granted to the landlord was a de facto arrangement which did not defeat the protection of the Acts. A The relevant question, said the learned judge, is: "What was demised?" The kitchen was demised. A licence to the landlord to use it given by the tenant, perhaps later, perhaps not to last as long as the lease, could not alter this position. In Bowler v. Williams (5), a Court of Appeal decision, the county court judge had found that the kitchen (or scullery) was among the rooms let to the tenant and that there was no agreement to share it, but that there was a temporary licence B granted by the tenant to the landlord to use the kitchen or scullery for a few weeks. The Court of Appeal on these facts held there was no "sharing" such as to remove the protection of the Acts. Rainger v. Kerrison (4) and Bowler v. Williams (5) are both cases in which the tenant, having exclusive possession of the kitchen, granted a licence over it to the landlord and not vice versa.

Before considering the argument advanced by counsel for the landlord in support of the order for possession, it is necessary to determine the impact on the issues involved of the decision of the House of Lords in Baker v. Turner (2). Until their Lordships decided that case, there was a tendency to assume that if A "shared" a subject-matter with B, B "shared" that subject-matter with A, C in a sense of the word "shared" which applied impartially as between them. D Baker v. Turner (2) in the present connection gives the quietus to this facile assumption and decides that where there are two people sharing they need not "share" in the same sense or on an equal basis. They may, if the barbarism can be tolerated, the one be "sharer" and the other "sharee." As between the parties to the sharing, the rights in the thing shared enjoyed by each may be disparate. Both LORD PORTER and LORD MACDERMOTT make this clear in relation to the facts before them in that case. A let to B. B sub-let to C, subject to liberty E on the part of C to use the kitchen in common with B. Here C is "sharing" with B, and for that reason is unprotected by the Acts, but B is not sharing with C, and he retains protection of the Acts. Why? Because the quality of B's rights in the kitchen differs wholly from the quality of C's rights in it. B can (it may be, must) F repair and re-decorate the kitchen. He can hang in it what pictures he likes, can turn on the wireless, and can admit other licensees to use it. C cannot do any of these things. B in this connection is dominant, C is servient. B can say of C: "You are a mere sharer. I can extrude you. You cannot say I have let to you a separate dwelling." But A cannot say the same to B, for B retains a general exclusive dominion of the kitchen, subject only to the licence given by him to C.

In Baker v. Turner (2) it so happened that three parties were involved—the lessor, the lessee, and a sub-lessee, but the logic of the decision must necessarily G apply to a case in which there are only two parties, X lessor, and Y lessee. As between these two, if there be a lease to the lessee of, say, the whole house less the kitchen and the grant of a right to the lessee to use the kitchen along with the lessor, then the lessee is unprotected. But if all the house, including the H kitchen, is let to the lessee, who then grants the lessor a right or licence to use the kitchen in common with himself, the lessee continues protected. In other words, the grantor of the right to share is in a very different position from the grantee. The grantee of such a right is not the lessee of a separate dwelling. Baker v. Turner (2) does not expressly decide this, but it seems to me firmly explicit in its logic.

This is the foundation of the argument for the landlord in the present appeal. Counsel argues that the subject-matter of a so-called "sharing" must be a recognised juridical entity. The subject-matter of a demise is a physical item of realty. A demise confers on Y exclusive possession of this item and an "estate" in it. A licence confers neither, but only permission to use this item of realty without being guilty of a trespass. But he contends that any right intermediate between the two, a right of joint or common user capable of being demised, is a legal chimera. Counsel, accordingly, boldly argues that where a demise of certain rooms is accompanied with a grant of user of other rooms in common with the landlord, the right of user of the other rooms, though sometimes spoken of as "let," is nothing more or less than a licence to use them, co-extensive in duration with the lease. In my view, his submission is supported by the following passage from the speech of LORD REID in Baker v. Turner (2) ([1950] 1 All E.R. 854):

"If a tenant has to share with another person a living room which is not let to him, it is, in my view, impossible to find anything which is let to him as a separate dwelling. It cannot be the let rooms plus the right to use the other room, because that other room is not let to him at all—he is only a licensee there."

Counsel couples this submission with another, viz., that the recipient of such a licence from his landlord is a "sharer" or "grantee" disabled as such from enjoying the protection of the Acts while the grantor of the licence is not. Of course, where the landlord is the grantor, as in the present case, he does not need this particular kind of immunity, but where, as in Baker v. Turner (2), the position of a head lessee who has sub-let, as against the head landlord, has to be determined, his possession of that immunity may make all the difference to him.

For myself, I accept the argument of counsel for the landlord in its essentials so far as they are applicable in this case. The grantee of a licence to use a kitchen seems to me to differ in name only from the grantee of a right to "share" or use it in common with the landlord. I asked counsel for the tenant to indicate what the grantee of either right could do to the room which the grantee of the other right could not, and I do not consider that he had any real answer to this question. If we decided otherwise, the effect of Neale v. Del Soto (3), which has been accepted by the House of Lords, could be circumvented in every case by simply substituting the word "licence" for "share" or for "right to use in common." For these reasons I consider the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of LORD ASQUITH. I agree entirely with the reasons there formulated and the decision there announced, and for myself do not desire to add anything further.

LLOYD-JACOB, J., read the following judgment. It is with regret that I find myself unable to concur in the conclusion reached by my brethren. The decision of the House of Lords in Baker v. Turner (2) has now made manifest that the fact of multiple use of an essential living room does not necessarily result in depriving the portion of a house which includes that living room of its character of a separate dwelling and that protection by the Rent Acts is only lost if the occupation enjoyed by the statutory tenant is not of a separate dwelling. The tenant was possessed of a statutory tenancy of the whole premises at 75, Allesley Old Road, Coventry, in 1940, and continued in full possession until after an initial hearing of a summons for possession issued by her then landlord, one Cleaver, in July, 1945. That hearing was adjourned, apparently, to enable the parties to arrive at some suitably acceptable arrangement by which both could occupy the property and was restored for further hearing in April, 1949. After a partial hearing terms of settlement of the proceedings were agreed. These terms were carried into practice for a short time, and in August, 1949, the plaintiff purchased the house from Cleaver, with knowledge of the terms of settlement. Cleaver vacated such portion of the premises as he had been permitted to occupy under the terms of settlement, and the present landlord moved in. In March, 1950, the landlord became desirous of selling the property, and, doubtless to secure the enhancement of price which is a consequence of vacant possession, purported to determine the tenant's tenancy by a notice to quit, and commenced the present proceedings.

In my judgment, the tenant was entitled to rely, during the pendency of the original summons for possession between 1945 and 1949, on the well-established rule of law that the material time for the determination of the issues between her and her landlord was the moment when action was brought, and it would be wrong, in my judgment, to penalise her for any consideration which she showed during those years to her landlord. The case must, therefore, be determined on the terms of settlement dated Apr. 11, 1949, made between the holder of a protected tenancy and her landlord. The terms provide, inter alia (see cl. 3 and cl. 10) that the tenant was to be granted a weekly tenancy, within the Rent Acts, of part of the house and not the whole. This reference to the Rent Acts is not, as I see it, an attempt by contract to limit the jurisdiction of the court, but an acknowledgment by the parties that forfeiture of protection under the Rent Acts was not contemplated or intended. The sole use of certain defined rooms and the joint use of certain ancillary accommodation is specified, and by cl. 9 it is provided that the tenant is to have licence to use the scullery (kitchen) at all reasonable times. Such scullery (kitchen) is admittedly an essential living room, and it is neither included within the accommodation expressly reserved either to the tenant or to the landlord, nor within that expressly recited as for joint use. The evidence that both landlord and tenant have enjoyed the use of the scullery (kitchen) since the conclusion of the litigation is no more determinate of the issue than the absence of reference to it in the list of exclusively and jointly used accommodation.

To justify an order for possession, the landlord must establish that the tenancy enjoyed by the tenant does not extend to a separate dwelling, which includes an essential living room, namely, a kitchen. If he carried out the provisions of cl. 3 and cl. 10, clearly such a tenancy would be created. It is contended that the presence of cl. 9 is inconsistent with such a tenancy. I cannot so regard it, particularly where, as here, the scullery (kitchen) was at the date of the settlement in fact within the tenant's tenancy. No express words exclude it from the tenancy contemplated by the terms. The language of cl. 9 is consistent with the inclusion of the kitchen within the tenancy, but because, for example, of the supply of gas and electricity, to which the provisions of cl. 4 (c) relate, the user of the services therein provided should be kept within reasonable bounds. If the licence were determined or surrendered, no doubt separate supplies of gas and electricity would need to be provided. But it would be an unjustifiable extension of the Neale v. Del Soto (3) line of cases, in my judgment, to hold that the absence of a separate gas and electricity meter prevents a set of rooms from being a separate dwelling. Where, as here, the terms of settlement can be construed in a consistent fashion, it would be intolerable to adopt an alternative construction which not only evades the expressed intention of the parties, but deprives the tenant of a statutory provision. For my part, I would allow this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

WILLIAM CORY & SON, LTD. v. CITY OF LONDON CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Asquith of Bishopstone, Birkett, L.J., and Harman, J.),
April 11, 12, May 10, 1951.]

Contract—Repudiation—Anticipatory breach—Contract with corporation for removal of refuse—Undertaking by contractors to observe bye-laws—Sealing of new bye-laws—Substantial additional burden on contractors.

The City of London Corporation, as the sanitary authority, made a contract for the removal of refuse from the city of London under which the contractors undertook to use lighters and barges fitted with "temporary coamings and coverings to be secured to the permanent coamings" and to comply with the bye-laws of the port health authority for the port of London as to removal of refuse. In April, 1948, when the contract still had a prospective life of some twenty years, the corporation, in their capacity of port health authority, sealed new bye-laws which were due to come into force in November, 1950. One of these bye-laws required every vessel transporting refuse to be provided with "permanent coamings and close-fitting hatches to such coamings, capable of completely covering the refuse, and . . . waterproof sheeting for covering such hatches." It was not disputed that the additional burden thrown on the contractors by this bye-law was such as would entitle them, when the bye-law came into force, to treat the contract as having been frustrated, but it was contended by the contractors that the making of the bye-law was an anticipatory breach of contract, entitling them forthwith to treat the contract as repudiated.

HELD: while it was an implied term of any contract that one party would not do anything to disable the other party from performing the contract, the implication of a term that the corporation would not make bye-laws of the nature of that now in dispute would impose an unwarrantable fetter on the corporation in the exercise of their statutory duties under the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, s. 84 (1) (a); such a term would be ultra vires the corporation; and, therefore, the sealing of the bye-laws was not a breach of a valid term of the contract and did not entitle the contractors immediately to treat the contract as repudiated.

APPEAL by the claimants, William Cory & Son, Ltd., from an order of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated July 4, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 584, made on a Case stated by the town clerk of the city of London pursuant to an arbitration clause in an agreement.

The claimants, a company of lightermen and barge-owners, had contracted with the City of London Corporation for the removal of refuse by barge, a term of the agreement being that they should comply with the bye-laws of the port health authority of the port of London. The corporation were the sanitary authority for the city and also port health authority for the port. The company contended that they were entitled to treat the contract as immediately determined on the ground that it had been repudiated by the corporation when they sealed new bye-laws, one of which imposed (as from a certain future date) so substantial a burden on the company in equipping their barges as to entitle them, when it came into force, to treat the contract as frustrated. LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that the contract had not been repudiated.

Sir Walter Monckton, K.C., and Harvey, K.C. for the claimants.

Harold B. Williams, K.C., and Wilfrid Hunt for the corporation.

Our. adv. vult.

May 10. LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE (read by BIRKETT, L.J.): This is an appeal from a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., resolving in favour of the respondents a point of law raised in an award in the form of a Special Case made in an arbitration between the claimants and the respondents. The arbitration took place in pursuance of an arbitration clause in a written contract between the parties dated Dec. 17, 1936.

The Corporation of London entered into this contract in its character as the sanitary authority for the purposes of the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, of the city of London, and, as such, the authority charged with responsibility for the removal of refuse from premises within the city. The corporation is also, by s. 5 of the same Act, the public health authority of the port of London, and, as such, charged with responsibility for making laws in relation, inter alia, to the disposal of refuse within the larger area of the port. The contract formulated the terms on which the claimants, William Cory & Son, Ltd., well-known barge and lighter owners, agreed with the corporation in its capacity as sanitary authority for the city to remove this refuse from Letts Wharf and to carry it in barges or lighters down the river to Hornchurch, where it was to be dumped. The most material of these terms for the present purpose were cl. 1 and cl. 13. Clause 1 provides:

"The contractors shall at all times during the continuance of this agreement provide at Letts Wharf on the River Thames such a number of staunch and strong lighters and barges which shall for the purpose of this agreement be fitted and maintained with temporary coamings and coverings to be secured to the permanent coamings as will be sufficient to remove the materials aforesaid from Letts Wharf aforesaid and in particular they shall at all times have so many lighters and barges moored alongside Letts Wharf aforesaid as will in the opinion of the director of public cleansing be sufficient for the reception of the materials aforesaid as the same are brought or conveyed to Letts Wharf aforesaid and are required by the director of public cleansing to be removed therefrom. Each lighter and barge shall be supplied by the contractors with sufficient hands tools and tackle."

Clause 13 of the agreement provides:

"Subject to the provisions of cl. 1 hereof the contractors shall at all times observe and comply with the bye-laws of the port health authority of the port of London for (a) the prevention of nuisances arising from refuse loaded into lighters or barges (b) the efficient cleansing of lighters or barges after discharge of loads and (c) the prescribed times during which loaded lighters or barges may remain in the district of the said port health authority. The contractors shall also at all times observe and comply with the provisions of all Acts of Parliament bye-laws rules regulations and orders of the Minister of Health Board of Trade Essex County Council the Port of London Authority River Police and/or any public authority relating to the transport dumping and/or disposal of refuse traffic and/or offences on the River Thames and/or any matter or thing arising out of this agreement."

A The contract proved a bad bargain for the claimants. They were losing, even before the event next to be mentioned, about £7,000 a year on it. Then on Apr. 29, 1948, the corporation, acting in their other capacity (namely, as port health authority) on the advice of the medical officer of health of the port of London, sealed new bye-laws which were confirmed in July, 1948, by the Minister of Health. Number 2 of these bye-laws required that any vessel for removing refuse from the port of London must be provided with permanent coamings and close-fitting hatches capable of completely covering the refuse. Bye-law No. 2 was to take effect on Nov. 1, 1950. It is really unnecessary to B consider with precision or in any detail the various and contrasting requirements as to coamings, hatches and the like in the two sets of bye-laws and in cl. 1 of the contract. It is sufficient for the present purpose (i) that when the contract of 1936 was made the only relevant bye-laws in existence were those of 1897, the requirements of which were less stringent in this regard than those imposed by cl. 1 of the contract; (ii) that the requirements of the bye-laws C of 1948 were very much more stringent than those imposed by cl. 1, and a fortiori more stringent than those imposed by the bye-laws of 1897; (iii) that a compliance with the bye-laws of 1948 would have been in a commercial sense prohibitively onerous to the claimants who would have had to spend £400 or £500 on every barge and could no longer have used the barges which went to Hornchurch down river to return up river with cargoes of coal as theretofore; (iv) that in the ordinary course the contract would have run on for D another twenty-one years from 1948. (It was to continue for ten years and for a subsequent period until the Hornchurch dumps reached a specified height which they would have reached by 1969).

E On Sept. 21, 1948, the claimants wrote a letter to the corporation purporting to treat the act of the latter in sealing the bye-laws of 1948 as an anticipatory repudiation of the contract—and accepting that repudiation. The passage in the letter reads:

"I, therefore, write this letter to make it plain that my company regards the publication of the new bye-laws as amounting to a refusal by the corporation to allow the contract to run its natural course, and as entitling the company to treat the contract as at an end, which they hereby do."

F The attitude of the claimants then and thereafter was that the corporation, by making the new bye-laws in 1948, was then and thereby evincing an intention to prevent the claimants from performing the contract according to its tenor as from Nov. 1, 1950, when these new and crippling provisions were timed to take effect, and that this amounted to an anticipatory repudiation of the contract G by the corporation entitling the claimants to proceed immediately, in 1948, for a declaration that as from September, 1948, they themselves (the claimants) were no longer bound. This they did in the arbitration. The question of law arising on the award in the form of a Special Case was thus formulated by the arbitrator:

H "The question for the opinion of the court is: Did the act of the respondents in their capacity as port health authority in sealing and procuring the confirmation of the new bye-laws, confirmed on July 16, 1948, amount to a repudiation by the respondents of the said agreement dated Dec. 17, 1936, so as to entitle the claimants in law, notwithstanding that bye-law No. 2 is not to come into operation until Nov. 1, 1950, to treat the said agreement as determined on Sept. 21, 1948?"

The substantial question, therefore, is whether the act of the corporation in making Bye-law No. 2 of 1948 was a breach of the contract going to its root and an anticipatory breach entitling the claimants to elect to say in 1948 that they were no longer bound by it as from 1948, even though the bye-law was not to take effect till November, 1950. It is, apparently, not disputed by the corporation that, if the act in question was not a breach and not a repudiation, it was at the lowest a factor which made the contract commercially impossible of performance after Nov. 1, 1950, which frustrated it as from that date.

The first question, therefore, is whether the corporation's act in making Bye-law No. 2 of 1948 was a breach of the contract at all. I will consider this, first, in abstraction from cl. 13 of this contract. The claimants argue that it is an implied term of every, or almost every, contract between A and B (and certainly of this contract) that A shall not prevent or disable B from performing the contract and vice versa, and that this was just what the corporation did by the act in question. In general, no doubt, it is true that a term is necessarily implied in any contract, the other terms of which do not repel the implication, that neither party shall prevent the other from performing it, and that a party so preventing the other is guilty of a breach, but an act cannot be a breach of a term of the contract, express or implied, (let alone a repudiation) unless the term in question is valid. There can be no breach if the term in question is illegal, contrary to public policy, or (in the case of a corporation) ultra vires the contracting party, or for some other reason waste paper, because in such a case there is no binding obligation, and only a binding obligation can be violated. One cannot break a rope of sand. It starts broken.

The term sought to be implied in this case is one whereby the corporation, a legislative body charged by statute in imperative language with the duty of making bye-laws relating, inter alia, to the removal of the refuse in the interests of the public health in the port of London, or, to be precise, to prevent nuisances arising from such refuse, engages not to make any bye-laws for this purpose which should lay on the claimants burdens other and more severe than those provided for in cl. 1 of their contract with the corporation, and, therefore, prevent the claimants from fulfilling the contract by complying with cl. 1 without more. I consider that such a term, whether implied or even express, could not be valid. The language of the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, s. 84 (1) (a), is mandatory. The provision is:

"Every sanitary authority shall make bye-laws—(a) for the prevention of nuisances arising from snow, ice, salt, dust, ashes, rubbish, offal, carrion, fish or filth or other matter or thing in any street . . ."

If the suggested term were express, it would have to take some such form as this: "True we are charged by Parliament with the duty of making such bye-laws with reference to refuse as may be called for from time to time by considerations of public health, but, even if these considerations call, and call peremptorily, for a provision not less stringent than that made by the bye-laws of 1948, even if a second plague of London threatens unless such provision is made, we undertake in such an event to neglect or violate our statutory duty so far as the requirement of such a bye-law may exceed the requirements imposed by cl. 1 of our contract with Cory & Son, Ltd." Such a contractual provision would seem to be plainly invalid.

In York Corpn. v. Henry Leatham & Sons, Ltd. (1), RUSSELL, J., had to decide a somewhat similar point. The plaintiff corporation were entrusted by statute with the control of navigation in part of the Rivers Ouse and Foss with power to charge such tolls, within limits, as the corporation deemed necessary to carry on the two navigations in which the public had an interest. The corporation made two contracts with the defendants under which they agreed to accept, in consideration of the right to navigate the Ouse, a regular annual payment of £600 per annum in place of the authorised tolls. The contract as regarded navigation of the Foss was on similar lines. It was held by RUSSELL, J., that the contracts were ultra vires and void because under them the corporation had disabled itself, whatever emergency might arise, from exercising its statutory powers to increase tolls as from time to time might be necessary. The learned judge based his decision on ([1924] 1 Ch. 572):

“ . . . the incapacity of a body charged with statutory powers for public purposes to divest itself of such powers or to fetter itself in the use of such powers.”

A

It is obvious how relevant this case, if well decided, is to the present. It has been criticised in Southport Corpn. v. Birkdale District Electric Supply Co. (2). In that case it was pointed out that the body executing the statutory duties in the York case (1) (as in the Southport case (2) itself) was a trading corporation, and that the discharge of such duties by such a corporation would be facilitated rather than fettered by a reasonable latitude of discretion in fixing prices, charges or tolls. In Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald (3) it was held by the House of Lords that where a statute confers power on any body, whether one which is seeking to make a profit for shareholders or one acting solely for the public good, to take lands compulsorily for a particular purpose, a contract purporting to bind such a body and their successors not to use the powers is void. Like the Ayr Harbour Trustees in that case, the corporation in the present case was a body acting solely for the public good: see also Mulliner v. Midland Ry. Co. (4).

In the present case the corporation acts in a dual character, though in both characters it is a sanitary or health authority, not a body trading for profit. Qua sanitary authority for the city, it has to employ contractors, and it was in this capacity that it entered into its contract with the claimants. Qua health authority for the port of London, it is charged with making bye-laws for the prevention, inter alia, of nuisances arising from dust, ashes, rubbish, etc., in the port. Neither in the former capacity nor in the latter (which is the directly relevant one) is it a trading corporation. It is charged with the duty of making bye-laws to promote public health, inter alia, by dealing with refuse, and the considerations which were thought relevant in the Southport case (2) (so far as that decision threw doubt on the York case (1)) have no application here. In this setting, it would seem that the implied term relied on would impose an unwarrantable fetter on the corporation in the exercise of its statutory duties under the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, s. 84 (1) (a).

F

The second argument on which the claimants rely is that, apart from any implied term, the express terms of cl. 13 of the agreement preclude the corporation from passing the bye-laws of 1948. The first few lines of the clause run:

“ Subject to the provisions of cl. 1 hereof the contractors shall at all times observe and comply with the bye-laws of the port health authority of the port of London . . . ”

G

H

This, it is said, means that Corys bind themselves contractually to observe bye-laws which (like the only ones in force when the agreement was made) fall short in stringency of the obligations in cl. 1, but that the obligations set out in cl. 1 (as to coamings and the like), which must also be complied with, (owing to the words “ subject to ”) constitute the high water mark, or, to adopt the cant of today, the “ ceiling ” of Corys’ obligations in this matter. “ Subject to ” is read as meaning “ rising to but not exceeding. ” I am by no means convinced that that is the true construction. What may be meant is that in all events cl. 1 must be complied with and that any bye-laws passed from time to time, whether falling short of or exceeding cl. 1 in severity, must also be complied with. But even if Corys were right on the point of construction, it seems to me that the answer to this argument is in substance the same as the answer to the first argument. Corys have to have recourse once more to their implied term: “ Under the contract I am not bound to do more than cl. 1 prescribes; that is the 'ceiling'; you are bound not to prevent me from fulfilling my obligations by a simple compliance with cl. 1. You have done this by passing the bye-laws of 1948." Such an implied term, for reasons I will not repeat, would, in my view, be ultra vires. In the result, I am of opinion that the decision of the Lord Chief Justice was well founded, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I entirely agree with the judgment of LORD ASQUITH which I have read, in the reasons given and in the conclusions, and for my own part have nothing further to add. A

HARMAN, J.: I agree with the result arrived at by my Lord and with the reasoning by which he reaches it. Counsel for the claimants argued that the term to be implied in this contract is that the corporation will not seek to hold the company to it while imposing an obligation more stringent than that imposed by cl. 1, and that, in effect, the corporation has admitted the existence of this term by agreeing that it cannot hold the claimants to the contract after the new bye-laws come into force. So far I follow him, but when he goes on to submit that the duration of this contract is an essential term and that in effect, by passing the new bye-laws, the corporation has shortened the term and thereby committed a breach which entitled the claimants to treat the contract as at an end from the time when the bye-laws were passed, I part company with him. It seems to me that the corporation, by deferring the coming into force of the bye-laws, did no more than give notice of them in advance for the convenience of lightermen using the river, and that this act of courtesy cannot put the claimants in a better position than they would be in if no such notice had been given. In fact, this contract, when made, was indefinite in duration and might have expired before now, and it is only subsequent events which have shown that it might have lasted for some time yet. The making of the new bye-laws has been looked on by both parties as a supervening event not contemplated by either of them when the contract was made, and, therefore, producing what is usually called frustration. From this point of view it is irrelevant that the supervening event was brought about by the corporation itself in another capacity. The argument seems to me an attempt to import into the doctrine of frustration the doctrine of anticipatory breach. In my judgment, this attempt fails because the two cannot be married in the way suggested. B
E

As to the question of construction, in my judgment, counsel for the corporation provided the right answer when he said that cl. 13 adds a contractual obligation to the statutory liability of the claimants to observe the bye-laws, and that, whereas the contractual obligations are limited by cl. 1, and, therefore, subject to it, the statutory obligations are not. In effect, the words "subject to the provisions of cl. 1 hereof" mean "without prejudice to the obligations of the contractors under that clause." So read, the contract has not been broken by the corporation and the doctrine of anticipatory breach has no place. F

Appeal dismissed.

TULIP v. TULIP.

DOWELL v. DOWELL. Lord Asquith of Bishopstone, Birkett, L.J., and Harman, J.), [1952] 1 All E.R. 141. [1951.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Application to High Court—Wilful neglect to maintain—Deed of separation—Covenant by husband for periodical payments—No default in payments—Improvement in husband's financial position—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949 (c. 100), s. 5 (1).

In June, 1932, the husband and wife entered into a deed of separation under which the husband covenanted to pay to the wife during her life for her separate use £156 a year free of income tax. The deed did not contain an undertaking by the wife not to take any proceedings for maintenance in the future. The husband made no default in payments, but since the deed his financial position had materially improved, while that of the wife had worsened. Also she had become a partial invalid, and the cost of living had greatly increased since the date of the deed. On an application by the wife under s. 5 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, for an order for a larger amount of maintenance, HELD: the words "wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance" used in s. 5 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, being the same as the words in s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, decisions of the Divisional Court construing the Act of 1895 should be followed unless they were plainly wrong; (HARMAN, J., dissentiente) from a consideration of those decisions it was clear that the existence of a separation deed providing for the wife's maintenance was no bar to her application under s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1949; the real question which arose was whether at the time of the application the husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance; and the wife was entitled to have the husband's covenant reviewed in the light of the existing circumstances.

APPEAL by the wife from a judgment of BARNARD, J., dated Jan. 31, 1951, and reported [1951] 1 All E.R. 563, dismissing an application by the wife under s. 5 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, for increased maintenance.

John Latey for the wife.

Temple, K.C., for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 10. The following judgments were read.

BIRKETT, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of BARNARD, J., delivered on Jan. 31, 1951. He dismissed the claim of the wife, Ellen Tulip (the wife of Joseph Edwin Tulip), made by way of an originating summons under s. 5 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949. The wife alleged that her husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her, and asked that he should be ordered to make such payments for her maintenance as might be just and that he be further ordered to secure such payments. C

Section 5 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, reads: D

"(1) Where a husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife or the infant children of the marriage, the High Court in England, if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation, may, on the application of the wife, order the husband to make to her such periodical payments as may be just; and the order may be enforced in the same manner as an order for alimony in proceedings for judicial separation. (2) Where the court makes an order under this section for periodical payments it may, if it thinks fit, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife the periodical payments, and for that purpose may direct that a proper deed or instrument to be executed by all necessary parties shall be settled and approved by one of the conveyancing counsel of the court." E F

Section 6 of the Act provides for the extension of the power to discharge or amend orders for maintenance. No question arose in this case on the words in s. 5 (1),

"... if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife ...," for it was conceded that the High Court had jurisdiction in this case. Before the Act of 1949 the procedure to be followed by a wife seeking to show wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance was to apply under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and the Acts extending and amending them. Strict limitation was placed on the amount of maintenance that the justices could order the husband to pay, but by the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949, justices may now award up to £5 per week instead of £2 per week. Under the Act of 1949 the High Court can order the husband to pay any sum which it thinks reasonable, and, if it thinks fit, it can also direct that that amount shall be secured. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23, now gives to the wife the right to apply to the court which had been given under the Act of 1949. G H

For the purposes of this appeal, the facts, which were not in dispute, were these. The parties were married in June, 1916, and there have been no children of the marriage. In 1931 the husband left his wife, and shortly afterwards he brought a petition praying for the dissolution of the marriage on the grounds of nullity. This petition was dismissed. Thereafter, on June 30, 1932, the parties entered into a deed of separation. The material clauses for the purpose of this appeal are as follows:

“ 1. The wife may and shall henceforth during the life of the husband live separate and apart from him as if she were unmarried and shall be free from his marital control and neither of them the husband and the wife shall in any way molest or interfere with the other of them or the relations or friends of either nor shall require nor by any proceeding whatever attempt to compel the other of them to return to cohabitation nor shall take any proceedings to obtain a divorce or judicial separation on account of anything already done by the other of them . . . 3. The husband hereby covenants for himself that if the wife shall so long perform and observe the stipulations herein on her part contained he during his life will pay to the wife during her life (if he shall so long live) for her separate use without power of anticipation such a sum as after deduction of income tax at the current rate shall amount to and leave the clear net yearly sum of £156 such sum to be considered as accruing from day to day and to be paid by equal monthly payments on the first day of every month the first of such payments to be made on July 1 next but no allowance or return of money shall be made in respect of anything once paid under this present clause if the said annual sum shall cease on any other day than the first day of any month. 4. The wife shall out of the provision made for her by these presents and out of her separate estate or otherwise in all respects support and maintain herself and pay and discharge all the debts engagements and liabilities which she may incur or enter into and shall indemnify the husband his heirs executors and administrators therefrom and from all actions proceedings costs damages expenses claims demands and liabilities on account thereof.”

The sum for maintenance was, therefore, the clear net sum of £156 per year to be paid monthly, and, no doubt, in 1932—nearly twenty years ago—it was regarded by both parties as a reasonable sum for the purpose. There was no clause in the agreement whereby the wife undertook not to take any proceedings in the future for maintenance. It was admitted that the husband had faithfully performed on his part all the provisions of the deed, and, in particular, had paid the agreed sum of £156 with complete regularity from 1932 onwards, and was doing so at the date of the hearing. There were the usual affidavits before the judge as to the financial position of the parties, and he found that the financial position of the husband had improved since the date of the deed and the wife's position had worsened. The wife, moreover, had become something of an invalid from spinal arthritis. BARNARD, J., appears to have taken judicial notice of the fact that the cost of living had greatly increased since the date of the deed.

On Dec. 7, 1949, the solicitors for the wife wrote the following letter to the husband:

“ Mrs. Tulip has instructed us to approach you with regard to the allowance of £3 a week which she is receiving under the deed which was entered into between you many years ago. We feel sure that you will readily understand that in the conditions of the present times this allowance is not adequate properly to maintain our client, and we think that in the circumstances you may be disposed to agree to increase it.”

On Dec. 22, 1949, Mr. Tulip wrote in reply to that letter:

“ Please remind your client that I do fully appreciate the changed conditions, particularly so in regard to the very much higher rate of income tax now pertaining than was the case when the deed was entered into. In the circumstances you will, of course, explain to your client that as the allowance is paid 'free of income tax' it now costs me considerably more than originally—actually on the present rate of income tax the allowance costs me £5 9s. 1d. per week, plus tax at 9s. in the £ on £70 being the difference between being assessed as a single man instead of as being married. So that the total cost to me of the allowance works out at over £6 per week. In view of the depression in trade which is now imminent I regret I cannot agree to any departure from the terms of the deed."

It was admitted that the husband had been guilty of no matrimonial offence in the ordinary acceptation of that term, unless, as it was submitted, the refusal contained in his letter of Dec. 22 constituted the matrimonial offence of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance.

It was submitted for the wife (i) that the existence of the deed of separation of June 30, 1932, did not prevent the wife from coming to the court and making her application under s. 5 of the Act of 1949, and (ii) that the judge in his judgment had said in effect that the existence of the deed, together with the husband's faithful performance of his part under it, made it impossible for him to hold that there had been any matrimonial offence by the husband, and, though the learned judge had nowhere said that the wife was estopped from making her claim by the existence of the deed and the husband's performance of it, nevertheless, his judgment in fact was made on this basis. Counsel for the wife relied for this on the passage in the judgment of BARNARD, J. ([1951] 1 All E.R. 565):

"Of what matrimonial misconduct has the husband been guilty? He has faithfully carried out the terms of the deed. He has made his wife an allowance with which she was perfectly satisfied at the time, but in view of the present day cost of living she is not now satisfied with it. Can I possibly hold that he has been guilty of some matrimonial misconduct? I do not think I can. If I were to accede to the argument put forward for the wife it would not be safe for any parties to enter into an agreement. What counsel for the wife is seeking is to get the amount varied. The wife wants the best of two worlds. So long as she is satisfied with the agreement, it will remain at the amount specified, but if the husband's means increase, she wishes the payments to be increased. He has agreed to pay and the wife has agreed to accept the amount stated in the deed, and so the matter stands."

Counsel for the wife also said (iii) that the only importance of the deed for the purposes of this appeal is its evidential value. If, for example, a wife were to apply to the court the day after a deed had been entered into, when she had had proper independent advice, the evidential value of the deed on the question of reasonable maintenance would be overwhelming, whereas, after an interval of twenty years, it might be of little, or of less, or of no, value. (iv) Counsel for the wife said the duty of the court is to look at all the circumstances of the case at the time the application is made, including the date and the provisions of the deed and of any requests made by the wife, and then to decide the matter solely by the test: Has the husband wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife? If the court finds, after consideration of all the circumstances, that the husband has so neglected, then the matrimonial offence has been committed, and the court may make any order it deems to be just.

Counsel for the husband submitted: (i) The provisions of the Act of 1949 gave the High Court the power to make the orders formerly made by the courts of summary jurisdiction and the provisions of s. 5 of the Act of 1949 only operate when a matrimonial offence has been committed. The decisions of the High Court in cases decided under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts should be followed in cases brought under the provisions of the Act of 1949. (ii) Where there is a valid subsisting agreement, acted on by both parties for twenty years, and the husband has duly paid the agreed sum for maintenance, wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife ought not to be found by any court merely because conditions have changed since the deed was entered into, and it is shown that the husband is in a position to pay more. (iii) Where it is shown that under an existing deed the husband has done all that he agreed to do and is willing to continue doing so, he is excused from doing anything more and has committed no matrimonial offence, and the provisions of the Act of 1949 cannot be invoked against him. (iv) Counsel for the husband finally submitted that the wife ought not to be allowed to approbate and reprobate the agreement by taking advantage of all the other provisions of it and disregarding only the provision relating to maintenance and refusing to be bound thereby.

Many cases were cited to us, and, as we do not propose to refer to them all specifically, perhaps a general word may be said about them. The words of s. 5 of the Act of 1949, "wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance," are precisely the same as the words in s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and decisions of the Divisional Court construing the Act of 1895, though not strictly binding on this court, are yet so weighty and so authoritative, that we feel we ought to follow them unless any of them should seem to us to be plainly wrong. In none of the cases cited to us were the facts precisely the same as the facts before us. There had usually been some default in payment from one cause or another, though in Matthews v. Matthews (1) the agreement for the payment of a lump sum and instalments had been carried out. Even where, as in the present case, there is an agreement in existence, the terms of which have been faithfully performed by the husband, the principles on which the jurisdiction is to be exercised must be the same in all cases. I, therefore, refrain from a discussion of all the cases and the particular passages to which we were referred by the learned counsel, but there is one case to which I must refer in a little detail, and that is Morton v. Morton (2).

That was a decision of the Divisional Court consisting of LORD MERRIMAN, P., and HODSON, J. It was decided so recently as 1942 and reviews many of the cases which were cited to us. It seems to me to be decisive on what, after all, is the main question for our determination. The facts of the case were as follows. The marriage between the parties took place in 1913. The two children of the marriage are adults, one a married daughter and the other a soldier twenty-two years of age. The wife took out a summons at Merthyr Tydfil for maintenance in 1930 and it was withdrawn on the husband's agreeing to pay the wife 20s. a week for herself and 10s. a week for the son. The agreed terms were that, in consideration of the wife's withdrawing the summons against the husband, they agreed to enter into a separation deed containing the following clauses: (i) Husband to pay wife £1 a week and boy 10s. a week, the first payment to be made on Saturday next. (ii) While unemployed, husband to pay to wife for herself and boy amount of dependant's benefit only. (iii) Husband to deliver to wife her goods and furniture. (iv) Wife to have custody of boy with right of access by husband. (v) Usual clause that no proceedings be taken while terms of agreement kept. (vi) Mutual dum casta clause. (vii) Husband to contribute £3 3s. 0d. to wife's costs. The 10s. payment was stopped when the son started work. The wife summoned the husband for wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance and the summons was dismissed in February, 1934. She sued on the written agreement at the Merthyr Tydfil County Court in October, 1934, claiming £18 10s. 0d. as arrears of payments. The action was dismissed in January, 1935. Throughout the husband paid his wife £1 a week. In September, 1941, the wife again summoned the husband on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain. The magistrate granted her an order for 30s. a week. The husband appealed. In his judgment LORD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 273):

"It is unnecessary to attempt, as other judges have consistently refused to do, to give an exhaustive definition of 'wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance.' I am not satisfied that cases dealing solely with the meaning of the word 'wilful,' or cases dealing solely with the meaning of the word 'neglect,' are of very great assistance. Justices have to be satisfied affirmatively that the husband has been guilty of the subject-matter of the complaint, which involves, in the words of the statute, that he has been guilty of . . . 'wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance.' The phrase must be considered as a whole, and, as I have already indicated in Whittaker v. Whittaker (3) I agree with the view of LORD MERRIVALE, P., expressed in Jones v. Jones (4), that the phrase imports some element of matrimonial misconduct."

Later he said (ibid., 276):

"After very helpful citation of the authorities by counsel on each side, I think that the position on this summons is now free from doubt. The existence of an agreement is not a bar to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, neither on the question whether the offence has been committed, or on the point of amount; but I think it is desirable to emphasise, as applied to the circumstances of this case, how high a value such an agreement should have had in guiding the magistrate in the exercise of his jurisdiction, which unquestionably remains notwithstanding the agreement. I think that it might be helpful to cite two passages from judgments of LORD MERRIVALE, P. The first . . . was in Diggins v. Diggins (5). I should like, first of all, to point out that this was a separation agreement providing for a weekly sum by way of maintenance, and the husband, after two weeks, had made no payment at all, basing himself on the fact that the wife had, contrary to the terms of the agreement, so he alleged, molested him and that the weekly sum had therefore ceased to be payable. The maintenance, in fact, had not been paid. Of course, even if it were open to us, it would be quite absurd to doubt the propriety of the decision that the jurisdiction of the justices was not barred in those circumstances. Having alluded to the fact that the man had not paid that which he was liable to pay under the agreement, LORD MERRIVALE, P., said ([1927] P. 92): 'Apart from the deed, the case is clear. The husband has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife. What remains is to ascertain whether the deed excludes the jurisdiction of the justices'. Then he says this: 'It must not be supposed that there is an unlimited right in a wife under the amended statute, where-ever she has entered into a deed, at her volition to proceed to the justices to get the terms of the deed reviewed. That would be contrary to good sense, and I do not doubt, if any case arise where a wife who has entered into a deed proceeds in disregard of it to seek something different from the justices, that she will meet with an answer which will prevent the possibility of further question. If she does not meet with it at first instance, she may meet with it here.' What LORD MERRIVALE, P., was saying in the plainest possible language was that, if it is shown that the deed provides for periodical payments which have been punctually made, the evidential value of that deed, as showing that the husband has, by making the payments regularly, been providing reasonable maintenance for his wife, is extremely high. To put it the other way, the wife will have the very greatest difficulty in making out a case in such circumstances; but the jurisdiction, as such, is not excluded."

It is clear from a consideration of that case, and, indeed, all the cases cited to us, that the existence of a deed is no bar to the wife's application under s. 5 of the Act of 1949. Indeed, all the discussion in the cases on the evidential value of the deed would be quite irrelevant if this were not so. The real question, therefore, in the present appeal is whether BARNARD, J., was right in saying, as I think it is plain that he did say from the passage cited by counsel for the wife, that because there was a deed of separation in existence providing for maintenance and that provision had been faithfully observed by the husband, it was impossible to say that he had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance, and that, as no matrimonial offence had, therefore, been committed, the wife's application must be dismissed. I am of opinion that, in so deciding, BARNARD, J., was wrong. With great respect to him, he seems to have ignored several essential matters. He seems to have decided that a sum for maintenance, agreed to in 1932, was unalterable so long as the husband continued to pay it and was willing to go on paying it. The real question for his determination was not that, but whether at the time the application was made to him the husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance. That must mean reasonable at the time of the application, in the light of all the circumstances then existing. BARNARD, J., makes no finding on this at all. He does say ([1951] 1 All E.R. 565):

"He has made his wife an allowance with which she was perfectly satisfied at the time, but in view of the present day cost of living she is not now satisfied with it."

That might seem to indicate a possible view that the sum fixed for maintenance twenty years ago was not "reasonable maintenance" in 1951. BARNARD, J., continued (ibid.):

"What counsel for the wife is seeking is to get the amount varied. The wife wants the best of two worlds. So long as she is satisfied with the agreement, it will remain at the amount specified, but if the husband's means increase, she wishes the payments to be increased. He has agreed to pay and the wife has agreed to accept the amount stated in the deed, and so the matter stands."

BARNARD, J., makes no reference to the letters of Dec. 7 and Dec. 22, 1949, relied on by the wife to show the refusal of the husband to provide reasonable maintenance to be wilful. I think that BARNARD, J., never considered, or if he did consider, never decided, the two essential elements in the wife's application (a) whether the husband was neglecting to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife, and (b) whether his neglect was wilful.

I think it is plain why he never considered or decided these points. His judgment was based on the view that where a deed was in existence providing for maintenance and the provision for maintenance had been faithfully observed there could be no matrimonial offence of "wilfully neglecting to provide reasonable maintenance," however much the circumstances had changed. In a word, he said that, once a sum for maintenance had been fixed by mutual agreement and embodied in a separation agreement, it must be considered to be reasonable maintenance for all time. In my view, this way of deciding the application was wrong, because it amounted to saying that the wife was estopped by the deed from coming to the court and putting forward the changed circumstances, and, if she were allowed to state the changed circumstances, it would make no difference because the terms of the deed prevented the judge from considering the changed circumstances. The agreed sum could not be varied at all. BARNARD, J., said also (ibid.):

"If I were to accede to the argument put forward for the wife it would not be safe for any parties to enter into an agreement."

This, I think, is plainly contrary to all the decisions hitherto made under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and is in conflict with the decision of the Divisional Court in Morton v. Morton (2). I am of opinion that the terms of s. 5 of the Act of 1949 are wide enough to permit a wife who has entered into a deed of separation to make application to the court, as the wife has done in this case, and to have the matter decided on the facts as they exist.

Some attention was given to two other points about which it is necessary to say a word or two. Under cl. 4 of the deed the wife covenants to support herself, to discharge her debts, and to indemnify the husband from all claims in respect of those debts. Her present action, in my opinion, in no way conflicts with the provisions of cl. 4 of the deed, which cannot be interpreted as a covenant not to bring proceedings in respect of the amount of maintenance set out in the deed. With regard to the argument addressed to us that the wife was seeking to approbate and reprobate the agreement between the parties—blowing hot and cold, as it was said—I do not think there is any force in the argument on the facts of this case. Nowhere does the wife covenant not to make any application for maintenance in the future. The essence of the agreement was that the parties should live separate and apart, and none of her covenants does she seek to evade. All that she asks is that the husband's covenant as to maintenance should be reviewed in the light of present conditions. The words of LORD ATKIN in Hyman v. Hyman (6) were ([1929] A.C. 629):

"In my view no agreement between the spouses can prevent the court from considering the question whether in the circumstances of the particular case it shall think fit to order the husband to make some reasonable payment to the wife . . . The wife's right to future maintenance is a matter of public concern, which she cannot barter away."

I am, therefore, of opinion that the wife's appeal should be allowed, and that there should be a new trial on the issue whether the husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife. I refrain from expressing any view of the merits of the application. It may be, in such a case as this, that the court might find it difficult to exercise its jurisdiction in favour of the wife, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, but with that we are not concerned. All that I am concerned with on this appeal is to say that the jurisdiction exists, and that the existence of a deed of separation is no bar to its exercise. If the court must weight the evidential value of the deed, as the decisions enjoin, it must be allowed to embark on the process and to consider the evidential value with all the other circumstances in the case.

I am authorised by LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE to say that he has read my judgment and he desires me to state that he agrees with it and has no word of his own that he wishes to add.

HARMAN, J.: I have the misfortune to find myself in disagreement with the judgment just delivered. I would dismiss this appeal, but I need hardly say I put forward the reasons which follow with great diffidence. I need not re-state the facts, which are not in controversy, nor refer again to the statutes, except to express my agreement with the submission of counsel for the husband that s. 5 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, did no more than extend to the High Court a jurisdiction already exercised for half a century by courts of summary jurisdiction. Cases, therefore, under the Acts from 1895 onwards seem to me to be in point, and an application like the present could, subject to the limits of amount imposed on the magistrates, have been made at any time since that year.

The question on this appeal is whether the court should, at the instance of a wife, relieve her from the obligation, imposed on her by a separation deed duly observed between her and her husband over the last twenty years, to maintain herself without making financial demands on him beyond that for which the deed provides. Change of circumstances since the deed was made has caused it to operate hardly on the wife, from whom one cannot withhold sympathy, but more than this is required to entitle her to be relieved of her contract. At one time separation deeds were looked askance at by the courts: see per SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Besant v. Wood (7) (12 Ch.D., at p. 620); but it has long been established that they are unobjectionable and an order for specific performance will be made in a proper case. Moreover, it has now for some time been clear, as LUSH, J., said in Eastland v. Burchell (8), that in cases of separation by mutual consent it is not for the jury to consider the sufficiency or otherwise of the allowance agreed to be made by the husband. He used these words (3 Q.B.D. 436):

“Where, however, the parties separate by mutual consent, they may make their own terms; and so long as they continue the separation, these terms are binding on both . . . and . . . no third person can claim to disturb the arrangement made between the husband and the wife . . .”

A The last words allude to the fact that the action was one by a tradesman, who had given credit to a wife, against her husband on the footing that she was in a position to pledge his credit. A similar view is expressed by LORD MANSFIELD in Ozard v. Darnford (9), where he said (1 Selwyn's N.P., 13th ed. 229):

B “ . . . if, upon separation, the husband agrees to make her a sufficient allowance, and pays it . . . the husband is not liable.”

It seems to follow that, so long as there is in force a separation deed binding on the parties and observed by each of them, the husband's obligation at common law to maintain his wife is discharged, or, rather, suspended. This is stated to be the law by LORD MERRIVALE, P., in Dewe v. Dewe, Snowdon v. Snowdon (10). The cases also show that the common law obligation revives where the contractual obligation comes to an end or is repudiated by the husband in the lifetime of the wife. Thus, in Diggins v. Diggins (5) the husband had ceased to pay the agreed allowance and claimed that the default of the wife in observing the terms of the agreement justified him in so doing. In that he may have been right. If so, his contractual liability was at an end, but the court held that the wife's common law right remained. This appears from the observations of LORD MERRIVALE, P., already cited by my Lord. These seem to me to show that the existence of a deed does not act by way of estoppel, for if it did the wife's only right would be to enforce her rights under the deed, but is a circumstance of evidence by way of answer.

In Dewe v. Dewe, Snowdon v. Snowdon (10) the husband (in each case) had become bankrupt, and the wife, by proving in the bankruptcy, had put an end to his contractual liability. Nevertheless, it was held that the common law right remained. A similar result was reached in Iles v. Iles (11), where the husband was not maintaining the wife on the ground that his contractual obligations under a deed did not oblige him to do so. In Matthews v. Matthews (1), which is, perhaps, the strongest case, the husband had agreed to pay his wife a lump sum in consideration of which she agreed not to ask for maintenance. He was not maintaining her, though he had paid the contracted lump sum, and it was held that he could not contract out of his common law obligation in that way. His contractual obligation had been fulfilled, but the wife was still living and in need of maintenance. In Morton v. Morton (2) the only decision was that the magistrate had no right to order the husband to pay more than the sum of £1 a week which he had agreed to pay, and had paid under an agreement. LORD MERRIMAN, P., made a number of observations obiter about the nature of the defence afforded by a separation agreement. He said the existence of such an agreement was very strong evidence. With that I see no reason to quarrel. He did not decide that the court could override the agreement, and it was not necessary for him to do so. Indeed, the decision, so far as it went, was to the contrary.

No case was cited to us, and I have found none, where a wife has obtained an order for maintenance by way of supplement to the sums being paid to her in compliance with an agreement. A wife, in order to set the machinery of the section in motion, has to prove as a condition precedent wilful neglect of her husband to maintain her, and, in my judgment, she does not overcome that obstacle if all that she proves be that the husband has declined to pay her more than she contracted to accept as sufficient. If this be right, the existence of a binding deed, the terms of which have been faithfully observed, is conclusive evidence that the husband has discharged his obligations. It has been said that the words in question involve some degree of matrimonial offence, and this I accept, and I cannot see that there can, in these circumstances, have been any offence. If it be said that the agreement was made in 1932 and that circumstances have altered so that a maintenance sufficient then is insufficient now, and that the time at which the court is to inquire into the sufficiency is the time when the application is made, I still answer that the wife, who has agreed to accept this sum over the whole period of her husband's life should she so long live, ought not to be heard to say that it is now insufficient. It appears on the face of the deed that both parties contemplated that the agreement should endure for their joint lives. They must necessarily have contemplated the possibility of change in the circumstances of either or both of them, and have agreed to accept the chances whether for better or for worse on each side. It would, in my judgment, be unjust that, because the bargain has turned out to be not so good as the wife may have hoped, she should be entitled to have it revised in her favour, while the husband has no similar right if his circumstances should deteriorate.

I have not overlooked the fact that in Hyman v. Hyman (6) the House of Lords held that a wife who had been divorced could not be barred from obtaining maintenance from the court by the provisions of a separation deed entered into before the divorce and expressed to endure for her whole life. The grounds for this decision, however, were, as I see it, that there had been an entire change of status since the separation deed was made and that what might be appropriate and binding on the wife so long as she remained a wife was not necessarily the right figure when she was a wife no longer. Moreover, there is, in s. 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which was the section there in question, no condition precedent necessary to be satisfied before the machinery of the law is set in motion. The House of Lords did not, in that case, overrule Gandy v. Gandy (12) (although LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE would have wished to do so), and that is a decision of the Court of Appeal refusing to override a separation deed in a case of judicial separation where the parties remained husband and wife. I point out, also, that Rose v. Rose (13) is still the law and shows that the court will hold that it is bound by the stipulations of a separation deed.

I turn now to the deed itself, which, like most separation deeds, does not consist only of a covenant by the husband to pay maintenance to the wife. She obtains from it other advantages—the right to live apart, freedom from proceedings in respect of previous matrimonial offences, the right to retain her personal chattels, and, on her intestacy, to leave her property to her next of kin. All these advantages she proposes to retain and also the advantage of the covenant for the payment of money, but she asks the court at the same time to relieve her from the burden of cl. 4 of the deed which obliges her, out of the provision made for her, to support and maintain herself. This seems to me to be an impossible position: qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus. In my judgment, no court should make an order in favour of a wife in these circumstances without requiring that she should abandon her rights under the deed. I think, however, that the husband is entitled to object to that course where the deed has been entered into by parties on equal terms and at arm's length, and has always been observed since. Moreover, if the deed be set aside, the wife's right to live apart goes with it, and the husband can in due course sue her for desertion and thus rid himself of his obligation to maintain her. Lastly, cl. 4 of the deed contains a covenant by the wife to indemnify the husband against all liability on account of her support and maintenance, and I do not see what answer the wife would have to an action by the husband on this covenant for repayment of any sums which the court ordered him to pay to her beyond the covenanted sum. This would produce circuity of action, and it seems to me to be a plain indication pointing the same way as the other considerations I have mentioned and resulting in this, that where there is an agreement providing present maintenance which cannot be impeached and which has not been repudiated, it ought to be considered as conclusive evidence that the husband has not failed reasonably to maintain his wife. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal, because it seems to me that, if we send it back to the judge below and he refers it to a registrar for a report, there can be only one answer.

MANTON v. BRIGHTON CORPORATION.

C [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), May 1, 2, 1951.]

Local Government—Committee of local authority—Member appointed for one year—Power of local authority to revoke membership before expiration of year.

D Acting under the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 85, which empowers a local authority inter alia to "appoint a committee for any . . . general or special purpose," to delegate to a committee so appointed any functions exercisable by the local authority subject to certain limitations, and to fix the number of members of a committee and their term of office, and under sched. III, Part V, para. 4, which gives to a local authority a general power to make standing orders, a county borough council made standing orders dealing with the appointment of committees. Standing order 27 provided that at the annual meeting of the council in May certain standing committees

E "shall be appointed for the ensuing year to perform such duties as shall be then delegated to them by the council." At their annual meeting on May 25, 1950, the council appointed standing committees "for the period ending with the next annual meeting of the council," the plaintiff, who was a member of the council, being appointed a member of three of F these committees to which were delegated some of the council's statutory duties. On Mar. 29, 1951, the council adopted a report of an ad hoc committee who were appointed to inquire into certain alleged conduct of the plaintiff and recommended that the plaintiff "should no longer serve on any committee of the council," and thereafter the council treated the plaintiff as having been removed from each of the three committees to which he had been appointed in May, 1950.

G

H HELD: the responsibility for the due discharge of the statutory duties delegated by the council to the committees remained with the council, the council had power to determine the authority of any of the committees, and, as they had the power to revoke the authority of a committee as a whole, they also had the power to revoke the authority of any single member thereof before the end of his prescribed period of office; the words, "shall be appointed for the ensuing year," in standing order 27, meant that no appointee should hold office after the end of the ensuing year, and not that the appointee should, in all circumstances, continue in that office throughout the ensuing year; no particular form of words was necessary to revoke the authority conferred on the plaintiff as a member of the committees, provided that it was made clear to him that the authority was determined, and the words of the recommendation of the ad hoc committee which was adopted by the council on Mar. 29, 1951, clearly effected that purpose.

ACTION for declarations and for an injunction.

The plaintiff was an alderman of the county borough of Brighton. At the annual appointment of members of the standing committees of the county borough council on May 25, 1950, he was appointed for one year as a member of three committees, the land and works committee, the staff committee, and the selection committee. On Dec. 21, 1950, the council appointed an ad hoc committee to inquire into certain alleged conduct of the plaintiff and of another person in relation to the allocation of housing accommodation at the disposal of the council. The committee presented a report to the council with findings, conclusions, and a recommendation that the plaintiff "should no longer serve on any committee of the council." On Mar. 29, 1951, the council adopted the recommendation and thereafter treated the plaintiff as having been removed from each of the three committees to which he had been appointed. The plaintiff claimed (i) a declaration that he was entitled to continue to exercise all his rights and privileges as a member of all committees of the council to which he had been appointed until his term of office on such committees expired, and a declaration that the resolution of the council on Mar. 29, 1951, was ultra vires the council and of no legal effect, and (ii) an injunction to restrain the defendants from in any way interfering with his exercise of his rights and privileges as a member of all committees of the council to which he had been appointed until his term of office therein expired. That matter came before SLADE, J., on a summons by the plaintiff for an interlocutory injunction. By agreement of the parties, the summons was treated as the trial of the action and was adjourned into open court for judgment.

Pollock, K.C., and Stogdon for the plaintiff.

Lamb, K.C., and Widgery for the defendants.

SLADE, J., stated the facts and continued: The Brighton Borough Council are a local authority within the meaning of the definition in the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 305. The power of a local authority to appoint committees is conferred by s. 85 of the Act, which provides:

"(1) A local authority may appoint a committee for any such general or special purpose as in the opinion of the local authority would be better regulated and managed by means of a committee, and may delegate to a committee so appointed, with or without restrictions or conditions, as they think fit, any functions exercisable by the local authority either with respect to the whole or a part of the area of the local authority, except the power of levying, or issuing a precept for, a rate, or of borrowing money. (2) The number of members of a committee appointed under this section, their term of office, and the area, if any, within which the committee is to exercise its authority, shall be fixed by the local authority. (3) A committee appointed under this section [other than a finance committee] may include persons who are not members of the local authority: Provided that at least two-thirds of the members of every committee shall be members of the local authority. (4) Every member of a committee appointed under this section who at the time of his appointment was a member of the local authority by whom he was appointed shall, upon ceasing to be a member of the authority, also cease to be a member of the committee."

It is to be noted that up to one-third of the members of any committee, except a finance committee, may be persons who are not members of the local authority. Section 96 (1), which refers to standing orders, provides:

A "A local authority appointing a committee . . . may make, vary and revoke standing orders respecting the quorum, proceedings and place of meeting of the committee . . . but subject to any such standing orders the quorum, proceedings and place of meeting shall be such as the committee . . . may determine."

B Finally, by sched. III, Part V, para. 4:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, a local authority may make standing orders for the regulation of their proceedings and business, and may vary or revoke any such orders."

That gives a general power to make standing orders as opposed to the special power conferred by s. 96 (1).

C The Brighton Borough Council have made standing orders, of which No. 22 to No. 28 deal with the appointment of committees. Standing order 26 provides, in substance, that all nominations of candidates for appointment to the committees in May for the ensuing year, including the members of the several committees for the preceding year who have not retired and are willing to serve and eligible for re-appointment, "shall be submitted by the town clerk to a meeting"

D of the selection committee, who are to consist of sixteen members of the council and are to be deemed to be a standing committee. The selection committee, having considered all the nominations, are to make recommendations to the council "as to the members of the council who shall constitute the several committees." The plaintiff was a member of the selection committee in 1949-50. Under the provisions of standing order 26, that committee made a report containing their recommendations which came before the full council on May 25, 1950, when the council passed two resolutions, which are set out as items No. 11 and No. 13 in the minutes of the council of that date. Item No. 11 reads:

E "Resolved: That pursuant to standing order 27 the following standing committees of the council be and they are hereby constituted and appointed for the period ending with the next annual meeting of the council, and are hereby vested with all the powers and duties in the terms of the appointments now submitted."

F Included in those standing committees were the three to which the plaintiff was appointed, viz., the land and works committee, the selection committee, and the staff committee. Counsel for the plaintiff put that minute in the fore-front of his case, and I emphasise the words therein which form the basis of one of his arguments:

G "... the following standing committees of the council be and they are hereby constituted and appointed for the period ending with the next annual meeting of the council . . ."

H Item No. 13 records the resolution of the council approving and adopting the recommendations contained in the report of the selection committee as to the personnel of each of the committees, including the three to which the plaintiff was appointed. Therefore, in the case of each of those three committees, the personnel approved and adopted by the council included the plaintiff.

Standing order 27 provides:

"At the annual meeting of the council in May, the following standing committees shall be appointed for the ensuing year to perform such duties as shall be then delegated to them by the council, and shall consist of the number of members or be constituted in the manner set opposite the names of such committees, with the addition of the mayor (where not specially mentioned), who shall be ex officio a member of all committees and sub-committees . . . ”

The words “ for the ensuing year ” are relied on by counsel for the plaintiff. The constitution of each committee is then set out. Some committees are to consist entirely of members of the council, while in others at least two-thirds of the members are to be members of the council and not exceeding one-third may be persons who are not members of the council. Included in standing order 27 are the land and works committee and the staff committee, but not the selection committee which is dealt with in standing order 26. Standing order 27 further provides that in addition to the standing committees specifically mentioned in that standing order

“ . . . it shall be lawful for the council from time to time to appoint any other committee or committees they think necessary.”

It was, no doubt, under that provision that the ad hoc committee was appointed on Dec. 21, 1950, to inquire and make a report in regard to certain alleged conduct of the plaintiff. Standing order 28 provides:

“ All delegations to standing committees other than those prescribed by statute and except where otherwise stated, shall be deemed to be pursuant to s. 85 of the Local Government Act, 1933, and to all other powers enabling the council in that behalf, and such delegations shall in all things be subject to the standing order and regulations of the council relating to contracts and to the conduct of financial business.”

The standing orders contain the usual power to suspend standing orders, and under standing order 6 a motion to that effect may be moved without notice. Standing order 14, on which counsel for the defendants relies, is headed “ Rescission of preceding resolution,” and reads:

“ No motion or amendment shall be moved which has the effect of rescinding or reversing a decision of the council made within the preceding three months unless it is pursuant to the recommendation of a committee which appears on the agenda or unless notice thereof is given, which notice shall comply with the requirements of standing order 5 as to notices of motion and shall bear the signatures of at least fifteen members of the council.”

I construe that order to mean that any motion or amendment rescinding or reversing a decision of the council made within the preceding three months must comply with one of two requirements, i.e., it must be made either on the recommendation of a committee appearing on the agenda or by notice of motion complying with a certain form and bearing the signatures of at least fifteen members of the council, but that no such fetters are required in the case of a motion or amendment to rescind or reverse a decision of the council which was made more than three months earlier. Counsel for the defendants says that that standing order makes it clear that the council can at any time rescind or reverse one of their previous decisions, and, where more than three months have elapsed since the decision was made, they can do so without either of the formalities prescribed by standing order 14. He contends, therefore, that, if a motion came before the council at any time seeking to rescind so much of the resolution which is set out in item 13 of the minutes of the council of May 25, 1950, as included the name of the plaintiff in the land and works committee, the selection committee and the staff committee for the ensuing year, the council would clearly have express power under standing order 14 to pass it, with the result that so much of the resolution of May 25, 1950, as appointed the plaintiff to those committees for the whole of the ensuing year would be annulled. Counsel for the

A defendants also contended that the reference to "the ensuing year" in standing order 27 merely limits the time for which the appointed members are to serve, viz., until the next annual meeting of the council and does not compel the council to continue to delegate their powers for the whole of that year to a committee containing all or any of the members appointed in May. No one suggests that any resolution was passed pursuant to standing order 14 annulling any part of the minute of May 25, 1950, and counsel for the defendants merely points to that order as showing that the council have full powers to annul or rescind any of their previous decisions, including those appointing members of committees. The powers and duties of the three standing committees of which the plaintiff was a member are set out in the BRIGHTON CORPORATION MANUAL. Those of the land and works committee appear under these words: "Delegated powers. The council do hereby delegate to the land and works committee . . ." Paragraph 1 consists, I think, entirely of statutory powers and duties, and there follow several other paragraphs. I emphasise the statutory powers and duties, because, although a council may have power to delegate the performance of their statutory duties to others, the responsibility for the due discharge of those duties remains with the council, and that fact seems to me to import the necessity for a measure of control by the council, who are primarily responsible for the due discharge of the duties, over the persons to whom the actual performance of those duties is delegated.

C Counsel for the plaintiff contends that a member of the council who has been validly appointed a member of a committee under standing order 27 can only cease to be a member of the committee in one of the following ways: (i) if he becomes disqualified under s. 94 of the Act of 1933, the rubric of which is: "Disqualification for membership of committees and joint committees"; (ii) by resignation under s. 62, which deals only with vacation of an office under the Act and not with vacation of a position on a committee, but, where a person has been appointed a member of a committee because he is a member of the council, by resigning his membership of the council he automatically vacates his appointment as a member of the committee; (iii) by statutory vacation of office through failure to attend meetings, under s. 63 (1); (iv) if the member of the committee becomes disqualified for office as a member of the local authority under s. 59. In regard to s. 63 (1), some support is lent to counsel's argument by the fact that, whereas s. 63 (1) provides for automatic vacation of office by a member of a local authority who fails for six consecutive months to attend any meeting of the local authority unless the failure was due to some reason approved by the local authority, by proviso (a) to the sub-section:

"attendance as a member at a meeting of any committee . . . of the local authority . . . shall be deemed for the purposes of this sub-section to be attendance at a meeting of the local authority."

G Thus, if a member of a committee can be removed from that committee, he will, even though his removal be arbitrary or capricious, nevertheless be deprived of the opportunity of preventing the six months running against him by attending the meetings of that committee. Counsel for the defendants admits that these statutory provisions are methods of disqualifying a committee member or causing him to vacate his office. They are, he says, automatic statutory disqualifications or vacations which operate independently of the volition of the council, but they are not the only methods, and he contends that a person who confers authority can always revoke it. He argues that the appointment of committees is nothing more than a permitted delegation by the council of their powers and duties, a conferment of authority on certain persons to exercise the powers and discharge the duties of the council, and that it is implicit in the conferment of any such authority that it can be revoked when desired, even capriciously—although it is not suggested that the council would act arbitrarily or capriciously—just as a principal can revoke the authority of his agent, even if the agent has a contract to serve for ten years. The agent might be entitled to recover damages from the principal for breach of contract, but he could not obtain an injunction to restrain the principal from refusing to allow him to continue to act as agent, as such an injunction, though negative in form, would be really a mandatory order on the principal to allow the agent to continue so to act. Counsel for the defendants contends that his argument derives some support from standing order 14, to which I have already referred.

There is no authority directly on the point which I have to decide, but I think that some assistance is to be derived from R. v. Sunderland Corpn. (1) and Huth v. Clarke (2). In R. v. Sunderland Corpn. (1) it was held:

“that the rule of the common law, that a person who is qualified cannot refuse to serve a public office to which he is appointed, does not apply to the appointment of a member of a borough council to serve on a particular committee of the council.”

The ground of the decision is that membership of a committee is not an independent public office, and a person who has been appointed to serve on a committee may lawfully resign from it against the will of the council who appointed him. LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., dealing with the argument that the common law imposed on the holder or the appointee of a public office the duty to serve in that office, distinguishes the position of a committee man in this way ([1911] 2 K.B. 462):

“But those cases are all clearly distinguishable from that of a committee man. They are all independent offices, which the position of a committee man is not. The appointment of the committees is merely machinery for the discharge by the council of its business, and the acts of the committee are all subject to the council's approval. The standing orders which have been made under sched. II, para. 13, for the regulation of the council's business do not deal with the subject of resignation from a committee; they rather contemplate that, subject to the exchange of committees with another councillor, a councillor who has once been appointed on a committee will in practice continue a member of that committee until his three years' term of office as councillor expires.”

I respectfully adopt those words, emphasising the words “in practice.” In connection with the last point, I hold that the words in standing order 27, referring to “the ensuing year,” provide a limit to the appointment, and that the words “shall be appointed for the ensuing year” mean that no appointee shall hold office after the end of the ensuing year. The use of the word “shall” in that phrase does not mean that the appointee shall continue in all circumstances in that office throughout the ensuing year. It merely indicates that in normal practice he will do so.

In Huth v. Clarke (2) it was held that delegation to a committee was not equivalent to a resignation by the appointors of their own powers. The appellant was convicted of the offence of failing to muzzle a dog in accordance with an order issued by the executive committee of a local authority who were responsible for carrying out the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878. The Act provided that the local authority might appoint an executive committee who were to have all the powers of the local authority and the executive committee might appoint a sub-committee and delegate to them all or any of the powers of the executive committee, with or without restrictions, and might from time to time revoke or alter any such delegation. The executive committee, who were responsible for carrying out the requirements of the Act, delegated all their powers and duties thereunder to a sub-committee. The sub-committee made no order in regard to the muzzling of dogs. Without in any way disestablishing the sub-committee or revoking or altering any of the powers entrusted to them (which comprised all the powers of the executive committee), the executive committee themselves made an order requiring dogs to be muzzled. The appellant sought to have the conviction quashed on the ground that the executive committee, by the delegation to the sub-committee, had divested themselves of all their powers under the Act, and that, therefore, their making of the order was a mere nullity. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., said (25 Q.B.D. 394):

A "It is suggested, however, that, because there was another authority which might (had it chosen) have violated good sense by making an inconsistent order, the executive committee had no power to make the regulation in question. But delegation does not imply a denudation of power and authority; sched. VI of the Act provides that the delegation may be revoked or altered and the powers resumed by the executive committee. The word 'delegation' implies that powers are committed to another person or
B body which are as a rule always subject to resumption by the power delegating, and many examples of this might be given. Unless, therefore, it is controlled by statute, the delegating power can at any time resume its authority. Here the executive committee has exercised the power which the sub-committee might have exercised—but did not—and no question of conflict of jurisdiction arises."

C Since the statutory power of revoking the authority entrusted to the sub-committee had never been exercised, the sub-committee, had they desired to violate good sense, could, apparently (as LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., suggested), have made an order that dogs need not be muzzled. What implication is necessary to prevent the possibility of such an absurd state of affairs? I would supplement the words of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., by saying that, in my judgment, not only
D can the delegating power resume their authority—with which, indeed, they have never parted—but they can also revoke the authority which they have delegated. If they cannot do that, the two powers would exist side by side and, hypothetically, might be exercised in entirely irresponsible and contradictory ways. WILLS, J., said (ibid., 395):

E "Delegation, as the word is generally used, does not imply a parting with powers by the person who grants the delegation, but points rather to the conferring of an authority to do things which otherwise that person would have to do himself. The best illustration of the use of the word is afforded by the maxim, Delegatus non potest delegare, as to the meaning of which it is significant that it is dealt with in BROOM'S LEGAL MAXIMS under the law of
F contracts: it is never used by legal writers, so far as I am aware, as implying that the delegating person parts with his power in such a manner as to denude himself of his rights. If it is correct to use the word in the way in which it is used in the maxim, as generally understood, the word 'delegate' means little more than an agent. The notion, therefore, that the use of the word 'delegate' implies that the executive committee parted with their own
G authority is misconceived."

Looking at the nature of the delegation in the case now before me (e.g., the powers and duties entrusted to the land and works committee), I think that the council cannot divest themselves of their statutory duties. They can get other persons to perform them on their behalf, and, if those persons perform them properly, well and good, but, if they do not, the council will still have to perform
H them themselves. Most of the functions of the standing committees were to make recommendations to the council, but in some cases they were entrusted with the exercise of executive powers. In so far as they merely make recommendations, the remedy of the council is easy, as they may refrain from adopting any recommendation they do not like. In so far as the delegation is of executive powers, it seems to me that the appointor must be able to determine the authority of the appointee. If there is power to revoke the authority of a committee as a whole, in my judgment, there must be a power to revoke the authority of any single member thereof, including a person who is not a member of the council. In the result, therefore, I hold that this action fails.

Counsel for the plaintiff referred to the form of the recommendation of the ad hoc committee which was adopted by the council on Mar. 29, 1951, viz., that the plaintiff "should no longer serve on any committee of the council." I do not think that any particular form of words is necessary when a principal desires to revoke an authority which he has conferred, so long as it is made clear that the authority is being determined. In my view, that is what the words of the recommendation which was adopted by the council connote. They convey to the plaintiff that he shall no longer serve on any committee of the council, and that the council by their resolution have revoked any authority conferred on him as a member of the committees. The conclusion at which I have arrived is quite independent of any alleged conduct on the part of the plaintiff. It is merely that there is power to determine, arbitrarily or capriciously (if the appointor so requires), an authority which he has conferred on some other person or persons.

Re A SOLICITOR.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Sellers, JJ.), May 1, 1951.]

Solicitor—Professional misconduct—Scale of charges—Solicitor acting for both mortgagor purchaser and mortgagee—Purchaser charged less than scale fee—Solicitors' Remuneration Act General Order, 1882, sched. I, Part I, r. 6—Solicitors' Practice Rules, 1936 (S.R. & O., 1936, No. 1005), r. 1, r. 2 (A).

A trade union, which advanced money on mortgage to those of their members who wished to buy houses, had an arrangement with a solicitor whereby he was to act for the union in their capacity as mortgagees, and, at the same time, for the prospective purchaser of a house. The solicitor charged the union the appropriate scale fee for investigating title and preparing the mortgage deed, but he charged the purchaser less than the fee prescribed by the Solicitors' Remuneration Act General Order, 1882, sched. I, Part I, r. 6, in a case where a conveyance and mortgage of the same property are prepared by the same solicitor. In doing this he acted on the view that, having investigated the title of the property and done other work in connection with the matter on behalf of the union, he need not do that work again on behalf of the purchaser, and so he would not charge the purchaser in respect of it.

HELD: where in such a case a solicitor investigates a title, he does so for both the mortgagees and the purchaser and owes a duty to them both; in the present case r. 6 applied, and the solicitor ought to have charged the purchaser according to the scale there laid down; and in the circumstances the solicitor had done acts calculated to attract business unfairly and had held himself out to the union as being willing to do work for their members at fees which were below two-thirds of the scale fees in breach of the Solicitors' Practice Rules, 1936, r. 1 and r. 2 (A).

A APPEAL by a solicitor from a decision of the Disciplinary Committee of the Law Society imposing a fine of £100 on the grounds of professional misconduct and breach of the Solicitors' Practice Rules, 1936, r. 1 and r. 2 (A).

Paull, K.C., and Colin Duncan for the appellant.

Havers, K.C., and Cumming-Bruce for the respondents.

B LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case the court is called on to exercise its appellate jurisdiction regarding a finding of the Disciplinary Committee of the Law Society which imposed a fine of £100 on the appellant and ordered him to pay the costs. The honesty of the appellant is not in any way in question, but it is suggested that he has offended against the rules of professional practice which have been drawn up by the Law Society under the provisions of the Solicitors' Acts. The complaint preferred against him was that he

C " (1) . . . permitted in the carrying on of his practice things calculated to attract business unfairly in that he (i) had for many years quoted to prospective clients in connection with transactions relating to real property fees lower than two-thirds of the scale of charges fixed by the general order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, which came into force on Jan. 1, 1883 [the Solicitors' Remuneration Act General Order, 1882], and the general orders amending that order; (ii) permitted officials of the D Amalgamated Engineering Union to hold him out as being prepared to do professional business in non-contentious matters affecting an interest in land at less than two-thirds of the scale of charges fixed by the general order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, which came into force on Jan. 1, 1883, and the general orders amending that order; (iii) allowed it to become common knowledge through the Amalgamated Engineering E Union that it was cheaper to instruct his firm to act for members of the union purchasing properties when his firm acted for the union on a mortgage of such property. (2) Failed to comply with the provisions of r. 2 of the Solicitors' Practice Rules, 1936, by reason of the matters referred to in sub-para. (1) (ii) above."

F The Solicitors' Practice Rules, 1936, provide in r. 1:

" A solicitor shall not directly or indirectly . . . do . . . any act or thing which can reasonably be regarded as . . . calculated to attract business unfairly."

By r. 2 (A):

G " A solicitor shall not hold himself out or allow himself to be held out directly or indirectly and whether or not by name as being prepared to do professional business . . . in non-contentious matters at less than the scale of charges (if any) prevailing in the district in which the solicitor practises, or if no such scale exists then at less than two-thirds of the scale of charges fixed by the general order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 . . . "

H In conveyancing matters, with which we are concerned here, the Solicitors' Remuneration Orders, 1882 to 1944, prescribe a scale which solicitors may charge.

The appellant, or his previous firm, have for more than thirty years acted for a trade union which was formerly known as the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and is now known as the Amalgamated Engineering Union. As part of their activities the union carry out the purpose of a building society, and advance money on mortgage to their members who want to buy houses.

The gravamen of the charge here is that the appellant had an arrangement with the union under which he was to act for them in their capacity as mortgagees and charge them the appropriate scale fee, but, at the same time, he would charge the prospective purchaser—who would, of course, be a member of the union—a far smaller fee than would be chargeable under the scale. That arrangement was made, the appellant says, many years ago, and it is clear that the business which has been brought to him by the union has been done on those terms. The case was fought throughout on the footing that the appellant had been charging less than two-thirds of the scale fee to the prospective purchaser, and the only contention which was made was that he had not held himself out, or permitted himself to be held out, as doing work at, to use a convenient expression, “cut rates.” That point was never mentioned to the Disciplinary Committee. Counsel for the appellant has contended that, as this is a penal proceeding in the sense that a penalty has been imposed on the appellant, he can take any point here which shows that the decision below was wrong. I reserve my opinion on the question whether this court, sitting in its appellate capacity, ought to allow points to be taken which have never been adumbrated before the Disciplinary Committee, but, as the matter has been argued at some length and the point is not without importance, we propose to give a decision on it.

The point is simply this. The appellant has been acting in a way which, if he was free so to act, was beneficial to the purchaser. It must be remembered, however, that the orders which have been made under the Solicitors’ Remuneration Act, 1881, and the Solicitors’ Acts, 1932 to 1941, are designed not only to protect the clients of solicitors, but also to preserve proper standards among solicitors themselves. Under sched. I to the Solicitors’ Remuneration Act General Order, 1882, the purchaser’s solicitors is entitled, in addition to a negotiating fee, if he has earned one, to make a charge

“for investigating title to freehold . . . or leasehold property, and preparing and completing conveyance (including perusal and completion of contract, if any).”

The mortgagee’s solicitor, who is provided for in the same scale, is entitled to charge for negotiating a loan, if he has done so, and then

“for investigating title to freehold . . . or leasehold property, and preparing and completing mortgage.”

He is entitled to the same percentage as the other solicitor. If in such a case as the present the mortgagee employs his solicitor and the purchaser employs his solicitor, no doubt the mortgagee’s solicitor will investigate the title to see that the mortgagee is getting a good security and the purchaser’s solicitor will also investigate title, because it will be his duty to see that his client is getting a good title to the property he is buying. The rules under Part I of sched. I to the order of 1882 recognise, however, that the same solicitor may act both for the mortgagee and for the purchaser, and r. 6 provides:

“Where a conveyance and mortgage of the same property are completed at the same time, and are prepared by the same solicitor, he is to be entitled to charge only half of the above fees for investigating title and preparing the mortgage deed up to £5,000, and on any excess above £5,000 one-fourth thereof, in addition to his full charges upon the purchase money and his commissions for negotiating (if any).”

If one solicitor is to be instructed to carry out the dual transaction, he will, of course, only once investigate title. In the same way, if he finds it necessary to issue requisitions on behalf of the mortgagee or the purchaser, by whichever he is instructed first, he will not find it necessary to issue those requisitions on behalf of the other party to the transaction. The rule says, therefore, in effect, that where one solicitor is instructed for both the purchaser and the mortgagee he is to be entitled to charge scale and a half.

A The view on which the appellant has been acting is that he could charge the union full fee for the mortgage. In satisfying himself whether the union could properly lend money on mortgage he would have to investigate the title on their behalf, and, therefore, he would not have to investigate title on behalf of the purchaser. Accordingly, he would not make the full charge under the scale to the purchaser because he would not have done any work for him. That, however, is not what the rule says. If the appellant investigated the title, he did so not only for the mortgagee, but also for the purchaser. Counsel for the appellant at one time seemed to argue that, if it was shown by the bill that the solicitor was not charging the purchaser for investigation and if he were negligent in investigating the title on behalf of the mortgagee and so allowed the mortgagee to lend money on a property to which the mortgagor had no title, he would not be liable also to the purchaser for allowing him to buy a property which had no title. That argument does not commend itself to me. A solicitor, acting for both parties owes a duty to both. If he investigated the title on one day on behalf of the mortgagee he need not go through the farce of investigating it on the next day on behalf of the purchaser. He has investigated the title, and he has investigated it both on behalf of the purchaser and the mortgagee, and then r. 6 of the rules under Part I of sched. I to the order of 1882 prescribes what charges he is entitled to make. It follows that any solicitor who has been doing this work on behalf of both mortgagee and purchaser is entitled to the scale and a half. If a solicitor charges something very much less, he is doing just what the rules were intended to prevent.

D [His LORDSHIP stated that in the instance put forward under the scale £24 would have been payable by the purchaser for investigation of title and conveyance, but the appellant had only charged £4 15s., and he continued:] I find it extremely difficult to say that the appellant has not sought instructions for professional business or permitted or done something in the carrying on of his practice which is calculated to attract business unfairly, because he is offering to do business, and letting his client, the union, whose members are concerned, know that if they come to him the work will be done at far less than they would have to pay if an independent solicitor was instructed. In my opinion, the facts show a clear breach of r. 1 and r. 2 (A) of the Solicitors' Practice Rules, 1936. The latter rule does not say that the appellant is to hold himself out to any particular person. He has, undoubtedly, held himself out to the union as being willing to do work for the members of the union at under two-thirds of the scale fee. The committee say that they followed the ruling which had been given by the Law Society as far back as July, 1937, in which they said this:

"A solicitor does not 'hold himself out' to a bona fide client if he agrees to do the work of that client at a special fee where the circumstances justify it, but he would hold himself out if he agreed with a bona fide client to do the work of some third party for less than the scale laid down in r. 2."

G In considering whether or not the appellant has broken r. 2, it does not, in my view, make any difference whether the client induced the third party to come along or whether he did not. The appellant has told his client that he is willing to do work for other people at a "cut rate." That is a breach of r. 2 (A), which is the only conclusion to which the Disciplinary Committee could have come on the evidence. In my opinion, this appeal fails.

H OLIVER, J.: I agree.

SELLERS, J.: I agree. The fundamental ground on which counsel for the appellant sought to upset the findings of the Law Society was, as he contended for the first time in this court, that there had been no undercutting of the scale charge which the appellant was entitled to make. He referred to sched. I to the Solicitors' Remuneration Act General Order, 1882, made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and said that not one of the items there applied, because in each particular case there had been no investigation of title, but the only item was "to charges for preparing and completing transfer and/or lease, £4 15s." But when r. 6 of the rules under Part I of sched. I to the order is referred to, it is quite clear that that is the rule which applies. As my Lord has said, r. 6 makes provision for the costs both of the mortgagee's solicitor and of the purchaser's solicitor where the conveyance and mortgage are completed at the same time and are prepared by the same solicitor. The submission of counsel, as I understand it, was that, notwithstanding the rule, in fact the work of investigating the title was not done, and, therefore, no schedule has been infringed by the charge. The fundamental fallacy of that submission is that there has been an investigation of title by the same solicitor for the benefit of both the mortgagee and the purchaser. In those circumstances it is not right to say that there has been no investigation of title. The one investigation has served for both, and r. 6 applies. For the reasons given by my Lord I think that the Disciplinary Committee were entitled on the evidence to find that there had been established breaches of r. 1 and r. 2 (A) of the Solicitors' Practice Rules, 1936.

Appeal dismissed.

[SALOP WINTER ASSIZES (Morris, J.), February 26, 1951.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Character of prosecutor—Prosecutor cross-examined as to alleged act of indecency—Admissibility of evidence of his general good reputation.

AS TO EVIDENCE OF THE CHARACTER OF THE PROSECUTOR, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, p. 190, para. 274; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 364-366, Nos. 3857-3874.

SUBMISSION as to admissibility of evidence.

The defendant was charged in the first count of the indictment with robbing one C. of £1 3s. on Nov. 24, 1950, with violence, and in the second count with assaulting C. thereby occasioning him actual bodily harm. During the cross-examination of C. counsel for the defendant asked whether on the night relating to the charge he made an improper suggestion to the defendant and committed an act of gross indecency against him.

W. F. Hunt, for the Crown, proposed to call evidence in rebuttal to prove that C. was a person of good general reputation.

N. A. Carr, for the defence, submitted that such evidence was inadmissible. Even though C. might have behaved indecently on one occasion, that was consistent with his being of good general reputation, and evidence to prove that he was a person of good general reputation could only prejudice the jury in his favour against the defendant. The jury had to decide whether C.'s evidence about the incident on the night in question was true or whether the defendant's evidence was true.

Hunt contended that, in view of the questions put, it was relevant that the jury should know what kind of reputation C. had. There was an analogy in cases of rape where a defence of consent was set up, when it was usual to ask what kind of reputation the woman held.

MORRIS, J.: I think the evidence in the circumstances is not admissible.

BOGUSLAWSKI AND ANOTHER v. GDYNIA
AMERYKA LINIE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Morris, L.J.J.), May 10, 1951.]

Costs—Apportionment—Three actions—No order for consolidation—Agreement that evidence in one action deemed to be taken in two others—Judgment in first action and adjournment by consent of second and third.

The plaintiffs in three actions, who had served on board Polish ships, claimed against the owners sums which they alleged were due to them under agreements between the plaintiffs' trade unions and the Polish government acting on behalf of the owners. An order was made that the three actions should be fixed for trial on the same day and that evidence in the first case should be deemed to be taken in the others, but no order for consolidation was made, nor did the parties agree that the first action should be a test case. On the day of the trial the three cases were called on together, and eventually judgment was entered for the plaintiff in the first action with costs, the other two actions being adjourned by agreement. An appeal by the defendants in the first action was dismissed. The same solicitor acted for the plaintiffs in the three actions. On taxation of the plaintiff's costs in the first action, the defendants took the objection that certain of the costs—in particular brief fee and the costs of witnesses—should be apportioned between the three actions.

HELD: the mere fact that it was agreed between the parties that evidence taken in the first action should be treated as evidence in the second and third actions did not afford any ground for the apportionment of the costs.

AS TO TAXATION OF COSTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, p. 102, para. 192; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Practice, pp. 926-958, Nos. 4688-4980.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of McNAIR, J., dated Apr. 13, 1951, on an application by the defendants under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27, reg. 41, that the taxation of the costs of the action made by the master should be reviewed.

The first plaintiff was an officer and the second plaintiff a seaman in the Polish merchant navy, and on July 5, 1945, they were serving in a ship belonging to the defendants. Until midnight on that day the Polish merchant navy was under the control of the Polish government in London, but as from midnight the British government ceased to recognise the Polish government in London and recognised the government which had been set up in Poland. On account of the political situation the first plaintiff left his ship, which was then lying at a British port, on July 11, 1945, and the second plaintiff left the ship on July 7. In an action brought by them against the defendants the plaintiffs claimed compensation which, they said, was due to them on leaving the ship, basing their claims on an agreement alleged to have been made on July 3, 1945, between the Polish government in London, acting on behalf of the defendants, on the one side, and the plaintiffs' trade unions, acting on behalf of their members, on the other side, and, alternatively, on an offer made by the government on behalf of the defendants and accepted by the plaintiffs by their conduct. The defendants denied liability under Polish law and further contended that the recognition by the British government of the new Polish government operated retroactively to June 28, 1945, and, therefore, acts done by the old Polish government after that date would not be recognised by the British government. On Mar. 31, 1949, it was ordered by HILBERY, J., that the action, with two other similar actions, should be fixed for trial on the same day and that evidence in one case should be deemed to be taken in the others. No order for consolidation was made. The same solicitor acted for the plaintiffs in the three actions. At the trial before FINNEMORE, J., the cases were called on together and on the twelfth day judgment was entered for the plaintiffs in the present action with costs, the remaining actions being adjourned. An appeal by the defendants to the Court of Appeal was dismissed ([1950] 2 All E.R. 355). On taxation of costs the master refused to apportion the plaintiffs' costs relating to, inter alia, brief fees and attendance of expert witnesses, between the three actions. In support of the master's decision the plaintiffs contended that there was no power to apportion as between separate actions unless an order for consolidation had been made or unless there was an agreement that the action in which the costs were being taxed should be treated as a test action governing the other actions. McNAIR, J., held that, as the relationship between the three actions so closely approximated to consolidation, an order for apportionment should be made.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of McNAIR, J., in a matter relating to costs. Three actions were brought by the employees of certain Polish shipping companies. Up to a certain date the Polish merchant navy was controlled by the Polish government in London, but there came a time when that government ceased to be recognised by the British government and a new government in Poland obtained recognition. Shortly before that event an offer was made by the Polish government in London of a gratuity to officers and men employed in the ships of a number of Polish shipping companies if they left the service owing to the political situation. A number of the men did leave the service and a number of writs was issued claiming the gratuity. The first of the three actions with which we are concerned was brought by Jan Boguslawski and Stanislaw Krupka against Gdynia Ameryka Linie Zeglugowe Spolka Akcyjna. The second action was by one Hys against another company, Zegluga Polska Spolka Akcyjna, and the third action was Lech v. Gdynia Ameryka Linie. On an application before HILBERY, J., the parties agreed that evidence in the first case should be deemed to be taken in the others. There was a great deal of evidence, particularly as to Polish law, which was common to all the cases, but there were other matters which might have led one to fail where another succeeded. The three cases came into the list for hearing before FINNEMORE, J., they were all called on together, and for some days they were entered in the list as part heard. On the twelfth day it was agreed that the second and third actions should stand over, that FINNEMORE, J., should give his judgment in the first action, and that the other cases should remain in his list. Judgment was given in favour of the plaintiffs and an appeal by the defendants to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was granted on the terms that the findings of the House of Lords with regard to Polish law in the first case should govern the other two cases. Up to that time the parties had not agreed that the first case should be a test case for such matters as were common to the three actions, nor had the actions been consolidated. The same solicitor was acting for the plaintiffs in all three cases.

When the bill of costs was drawn up, the defendants took the objection that certain of the costs—in particular, the brief fee and the cost of the witnesses—ought to be apportioned, i.e., the plaintiffs in the first action ought not to recover the full costs of calling the witnesses because it was said that that work was done on behalf of all three plaintiffs. In answering the objections the master referred to the judgment of POLLOCK, C.B., in Oppenshaw v. Whitehead (1), where he said (9 Exch. 387):

“ We were desirous, in cases of this kind, to lay down some rule which would be productive of economy in the administration of justice; but, after considering the subject with the greatest attention, we find it impossible to lay down any general rule which might not create more expense in discussing its application than would probably be saved by its adoption. We therefore think that, where the business has been actually done, the master ought not to take into consideration that the same attorney was employed by two or more plaintiffs, unless indeed there has been a consolidation of the actions. With respect to such matters as may be required to be done but once for both causes, such as subpoenaing a witness, making a journey, or the like, of course the charges must be divided according to the discretion of the master, exercised under the 'Directions to the Taxing Masters.' But in matters of this description, where the business is actually done in both causes, we think that, whether the causes are tried at the same or at a subsequent assize, the attorney is entitled to the same charges as if two different attorneys had been employed."

On the face of it Re Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Asscn. (2), to which the learned master also referred, was a very strong case for apportionment. KEKEWICH, J., said (45 Ch.D. 610):

"... if these two cases were in any way to be regarded as governing one another, it was for the defendants to come forward and say, 'Try one: and if you succeed in one, we will immediately submit, without argument, to judgment in the other'."

I would add that I think a defendant would have placed himself in a similar position if, instead of saying: "We will immediately submit to judgment," he had said: "We will treat the decision given in the first case as governing all the same issues raised in the second case." There might be some different issue in the second case which could be distinguished and dealt with separately. The learned master regarded that principle as applying in the main to the objections and refused to apportion.

From that decision the defendants appealed to the learned judge who reversed the decision. He took the view that the cases just referred to did not lay down any binding rule of law, and, having regard to the agreement made, he considered that the relationship between these actions closely approximated to consolidation. He said:

"I am satisfied that the bulk of the work involved in the items which are challenged can fairly be regarded as common to all three actions so that, if the plaintiffs in the second and third actions fail, it would be unfair to hold the defendants in the first action liable for the whole of the cost of this common work, and that, on the particular facts of these cases, the position was so closely equivalent to consolidation that apportionment should be made."

With great respect I do not follow that. The defendants contested the first action. Their contesting the first action compelled all this evidence to be called, and I cannot see why, if the second and third actions fail, which must be on some other ground, the defendants should not pay the costs which were incurred and had to be incurred if Boguslawski and Krupka were to bring their action. Approaching the matter from a somewhat different angle, it seems to me that the natural inference when an agreement like this is made is that it is made, not to diminish the defendants' potential liability for costs in the first action, but in order that the costs of the second and third actions should be diminished with regard to both parties.

It was suggested that there was authority for the proposition that in some circumstances a solicitor can require payment twice over for his work. There may be many cases where work done on one case is of some assistance in another, but that is not the type of case we are considering. In considering cases such as the present, no doubt the efforts made in one case make it necessary for very much less evidence to be taken in the others. It was suggested that the solicitor for the plaintiff might be entitled to recover in the second action exactly as if he had never recovered the costs in the first action in respect of matters common to both. We have not to decide that today. If that is the consequence of our decision, it is a matter which might well be looked into, but I doubt whether that result does follow from our decision.

For these reasons I think the learned judge applied the wrong principle. The idea of close approximation to consolidation is a difficult one and I do not think that it applies in a case like the present. Here one has either to show that there was an agreement that a case should be a test case or that the actions had been consolidated. The mere fact that it is agreed between the parties that evidence taken in the first action should be treated as evidence in the second and third actions does not afford any basis for apportionment. For these reasons I think this appeal must be allowed and the order of the master restored.

DENNING, L.J.: It is important to notice that the first action was tried out fully and judgment given for the plaintiffs with costs. The other two actions stood over and have never been tried. In those circumstances I see no reason why the plaintiffs should not get their full costs in the action which has been tried. The position might well have been different if the plaintiffs in the other two actions had had their actions tried, perhaps very shortly afterwards, and had obtained judgment with costs. I cannot imagine that the solicitor would be entitled to get paid three times over for the same work because he had won the three actions. I know that in Oppenshaw v. Whitehead (1), the Court of Exchequer consisting of POLLOCK, C.B., PARKE, B., and ALDERSON, B., decided that where two actions had been fought and won on substantially the same ground for two plaintiffs "the attorney is entitled to the same charges as if two different attorneys had been employed,"—in other words, that he gets paid twice over. That is not a decision of the Exchequer Chamber, but only of the Court of Exchequer, and it is not binding on this court. As at present advised I should not be inclined to agree with it, but it does not arise here. I agree for the reasons given by my Lord that we should allow this appeal and that the plaintiffs should get their proper costs.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

BEST v. SAMUEL FOX & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Asquith of Bishopstone, Cohen and Birkett, L.JJ.), January 24, 25, 26, February 1, May 10, 1951.]

Negligence—Wife's loss of consortium—Injury to husband causing sexual incapacity—Tortfeasor's liability to wife.

Husband and Wife—Consortium—Right of consortium—Husband injured and losing sexual capacity owing to defendant's negligence—Defendant's liability to wife.

An action by a wife based on loss of consortium owing to the negligent, but not malicious, act of a third party causing injury to her husband cannot succeed unless the wife can prove total loss of, as distinct from impairment of or interference with, that consortium. A wife cannot, therefore, recover damages where there is only an impairment of consortium, due, for instance, to the husband being rendered incapable of sexual intercourse.

Per BIRKETT, L.J. (LORD ASQUITH, dissentiente and COHEN, L.J., dubitante): Today the rights of husband and wife in the consortium are fully mutual and completely equal, and, before the law, the wife is entitled to bring an action when she has been deprived of her consortium by the negligent act of a third person.

Cur. adv. vult.

MAY 10. COHEN, L.J.: I will ask BIRKETT, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

The following judgments were read.

BIRKETT, L.J.: This is an appeal by the plaintiff, Mrs. Julia Best, from a judgment of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., at the Leeds Assizes on July 20, 1950, when he dismissed her claim against the defendants. Before stating the nature of the plaintiff's claim in the present action it is necessary to set out one or two preliminary matters. Mrs. Best is a young woman of twenty-five years of age, and she is the wife of Rex Holroyd Best, a man of about thirty years of age. Mr. Best was a steel erector, and on Mar. 23, 1946, he was employed by the Steel Constructor Co., The Steel Constructor Co. was carrying out certain work at the defendants' premises at Stocksbridge for the defendants, and Mr. Best was engaged in re-sheeting the roof of part of the defendants' steelworks.

In the course of his work he was obliged to go on the wheel track of an overhead travelling crane, and while he was there, owing to the negligence of the defendants, he was run into by the crane, knocked off the track, and, in falling, sustained the most grievous personal injuries. The agreed medical report makes it plain that as a result of his injuries Mr. Best is afflicted with a form of sexual impotence. He still retains the sexual urge, but he is unable to perform the sexual act. Mr. Best brought his action against the defendants, alleging breaches of statutory duty and negligence at common law, and on July 20, 1948, at the Leeds Assizes he was awarded the sum of £4,238 15s., with the costs of the action. On Jan. 12, 1949, the plaintiff issued her writ against the defendants. In her statement of claim she claimed damages from them on the ground that, because of their negligence, her consortium with her husband had been interfered with without justification in that she had been deprived of the opportunity of having further children and of ordinary marital relations. She alleged that the sexual impotence of her husband had had a most serious effect on her health. She suffered, and still suffers, from headaches, irritability, depression and a moderately intense anxiety neurosis. These ill-effects on her health were not disputed by the defendants.

The precise issue before the court in the present appeal may be thus stated. Are defendants who have been guilty of negligence causing injury to a husband liable also to the wife in the same or a separate suit for any injury to or impairment of her consortium with her husband arising from that negligence which she can prove? The novelty of the claim is not unimportant, and it naturally was discussed in the arguments before us, so that a few words on that topic might not be out of place here.

Our attention was drawn to Hittaffer v. Argonne Co., Inc. (1), decided in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on May 29, 1950. The husband in that case had been injured through the negligence of the defendants. The wife brought an action against the defendants alleging that in consequence of her husband's injuries she had been deprived of "his aid, assistance, and enjoyment, specifically sexual relations," and the court held that the wife had a cause of action for her loss of consortium due to the injuries suffered by her husband through the negligence of the defendants. In the course of the judgment the court said (183 F. 2d. 812):

"Although this is the first time this question has been presented to this court, we are not unaware of the unanimity of authority elsewhere denying the wife recovery under the circumstances. As a matter of fact we have found only one case in which the action was allowed, and that authority has been effectively overruled."

Some thirty cases from different parts of the United States are mentioned in a footnote to show the unanimity of opinion and authority to which the court referred, and the court claimed in its judgment (ibid., 813) to have pierced "the thin veils of reasoning" of the thirty cases mentioned, and added (ibid., 819) that the reasoning was "specious and fallacious." In the RE-STATEMENT OF THE LAW OF TORTS, adopted and promulgated by the American Law Institute, vol. 3, at p. 695, the matter is thus stated:

"A married woman is not entitled to recover from one who, by his tortious conduct against her husband, has become liable to him for illness or other bodily harm, for harm thereby caused to any of her marital interests or for any expense incurred in providing medical treatment for her husband."

In the United States, therefore, the issue has been raised in the form in which it is raised before us, but, apart from the decision I have mentioned, the claim of the wife has been denied. The reasons for this denial, collected from the thirty cases mentioned in the Hittaffer case (1), are set out in the judgment and need not be referred to here. In two cases in England the issue has been raised, but in a form quite different from the present case. In Lynch v. Knight (2) there was much division of opinion concerning the wife's right to consortium, but the case was decided against the plaintiff on the ground of remoteness of damage. In Davies v. Solomon (3) no decision was made on the point.

A The question at issue in the present case may, therefore, be said to be new, and the old question arises whether it is new in principle or merely new in the instance. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., after reviewing the evidence and examining and analysing the decisions in the relevant cases with great care, dismissed the plaintiff's claim. The grounds on which he did so appear to be: (a) Following the principles laid down in what are comprehensively termed the "enticement" cases the defendants had not done any active or intentional or deliberate act designed to break up or to injure the plaintiff's consortium, and, indeed, had no knowledge of the plaintiff at the date of the negligence in 1946. (b) If the plaintiff possessed a legal right to the consortium of her husband, the defendants' responsibility to her husband for their negligence towards him cannot be extended so as to make them responsible to the plaintiff when they had no intention "wilfully, knowingly or impliedly" of putting an end to, or, indeed, impairing, the consortium of the plaintiff. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., was also of opinion that, (c) if the plaintiff had been entitled to succeed because of the loss of consortium, she would have been equally entitled to succeed if she had only been able to show an impairment of the consortium and not a complete loss or deprivation, though, in view of his decision on the other points, he did not discuss the last point at any length.

D The submissions made to us on behalf of the plaintiff covered a very wide field, but, perhaps, they may be stated in this way: (a) The right to consortium by a husband or wife is now a well-recognised right at common law. It is fully mutual at this time of day, each spouse having equal rights, and the law relating to consortium is the same for husband and wife. (b) The right to consortium is quite distinct from servitium, servitium being an adjunct of consortium and not an essential ingredient. (c) Any unjustifiable interference with the consortium of the husband or wife gives the injured spouse a right of action against the party so interfering. This interference may arise from any tortious action, such as trespass or negligence, and applies also to the act of inciting a spouse to injure or destroy the consortium. (d) Inciting a spouse to injure or destroy the consortium is a separate tort, and knowledge of the consortium by the wrongdoer is an essential element, but, in the case of an injury to the consortium due to the negligence of the wrongdoer, knowledge of the consortium is not an essential element. (e) The view that the right of consortium depends on proprietary interest is now obsolete, and the growth and development of the law, particularly during the last seventy years, as evidenced by the changes in the position of married women made by statute, make the wife's position exactly the same as the husband's. The few remaining differences, such as the husband's right to sue for damages for adultery and the husband's liability to maintain his wife, whereas the wife has no right to sue for damages for adultery and is under no duty to maintain her husband, save in very special cases, make no difference in the matter of consortium. (f) In the present action it is not incumbent on the wife to show complete loss of the consortium. Any interference with it, or any impairment of it, or injury to one element of it, will suffice to support the cause of action.

H The submissions made by counsel for the defendants may also be shortly summarised in this way: (a) If the plaintiff has any cause of action in the present case (which is denied), then it must be based on the principles which gave rise to the old form of action per quod consortium amisit, and in law the plaintiff has no rights sufficient to sustain the action, the husband alone possessing these rights. (b) It is conceded that the status of the wife has been greatly changed by the growth of public opinion and the legislation of the last seventy years and today she possesses all the rights which spring from the religious or quasi-contractual side of marriage, but she is still without the rights or liabilities which spring from the husband's proprietary rights in the consortium. (c) The injury to the wife's consortium in the present case was consequential on the injury to the husband, and, as the wife has no proprietary right to consortium, the defendants are under no liability to her. (d) Mere injury to the consortium is not enough; a total loss of consortium must be proved. The present action is merely a claim for damages for the loss of sexual intercourse, although it is recognised how grievous the loss of children may be, and the courts will not inquire into such matters between husband and wife. Consortium is one and indivisible, and there has been no loss of consortium in the present case, for the parties are still living together under the same roof.

The term "consortium" is nowhere defined with complete precision. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., defined it as ([1950] 2 All E.R. 800) "the comfort and the decent and proper enjoyment of the affection of her husband." In some cases it is defined as "comfort and society," in others as "society and service," as in Winsmore v. Greenbank (4). BLACKSTONE, in his COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, 4th ed., vol. 3, p. 140, says:

" . . . if the beating or other maltreatment be very enormous, so that thereby the husband is deprived for any time of the company and assistance of his wife, the law then gives him a separate remedy by an action upon the case for this ill-usage per quod consortium amisit, in which he shall recover a satisfaction in damages."

In BULLEN AND LEAKE'S PRECEDENTS OF PLEADINGS, 3rd ed., p. 340, is to be found a declaration by a husband for enticing away his wife, and it reads:

" . . . wrongfully enticed and procured the said G. unlawfully and without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff to depart and remain absent from the house and society of the plaintiff."

In Lynch v. Knight (2) the term used by LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., and LORD CRANWORTH is "conjugal society" and by LORD WENSLEYDALE "the society of her husband" and "society and affection." In JENKS' ENGLISH CIVIL LAW, 4th ed., vol. 1, p. 397, the words are "society and comfort," and in LUSH ON THE LAW OF HUSBAND AND WIFE, 3rd ed., p. 3, the duty of the wife is said to be to "reside and consort" with her husband.

It is important, therefore, to come to a clear conclusion about what meaning is to be given to the word "consortium." In a notable dissenting judgment given in Wright v. Cedzich (5), ISAACS, J., said (43 C.L.R. 510):

"The mass of indefinable duties and rights are conveniently gathered under the one word consortium, and that is a word of equality, subject only to natural, and not legal, diversities . . ."

In Davies v. Solomon (3), decided some ten years after Lynch v. Knight (2) and before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the husband and wife sued for a slander on the wife, and the damage alleged was said to be under two heads, (a) loss of cohabitation with her husband and (b) loss of hospitality of friends. BLACKBURN, J., with the approval and concurrence of MELLOR, J., and HANNEN, J., described the first head of damage as "loss to the plaintiff of the consortium of her husband," but the court found it unnecessary to decide whether that was temporal damage sufficient to maintain the action because they found the second head sufficient to do so. BLACKBURN, J., began his judgment by saying (L.R. 7 Q.B. 114):

"The sole difficulty in deciding the case is caused by the opinion of LORD WENSLEYDALE in Lynch v. Knight (2)."

Lynch v. Knight (2) is of great importance in this connection. The case was originally argued in the Irish Court of Queen's Bench and later in the Irish Court of Exchequer Chamber. Both courts gave judgment for the husband and wife. The House of Lords reversed the decision on the ground of remoteness of damage. For a report of the arguments in Ireland see 5 L.T. 292, and for the decision of the House of Lords see 9 H.L. Cas. 577. On consortium, the view adverse to the wife's claim was thus stated. HUGHES, B., said (5 L.T. 292):

A "The consortium of husband and wife is, in my opinion, the right of the husband . . . The consortium is, as it were, the property of the husband."

FITZGERALD, B., said (ibid., 294):

" . . . I can find nothing in the wife's loss of her husband's society affecting her material interests . . . the loss of conjugal society is a special damage to the husband, and the husband only, who has thereby lost the society of one who is in law considered as his servant."

B In the House of Lords, LORD WENSLEYDALE said that there was considerable doubt on the question, but he had made up his mind that no such action would lie. The important passage is (9 H.L. Cas. 598):

C "The relation of the husband to the wife is in most respects entirely dissimilar from that of the master to the servant, yet in one respect it has a similar character. The assistance of the wife in the conduct of the household of the husband, and in the education of his children, resembles the service of a hired domestic, tutor or governess; is of material value, capable of being estimated in money . . . It is to the protection of such material interests that the law chiefly attends."

D LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., took the opposite view, and expressly said (ibid., 589):

"The wife is not the servant of the husband . . ."

LORD CRANWORTH was strongly inclined to think that LORD CAMPBELL's view was correct. LORD BROUGHAM was (ibid., 593)

"rather inclined to think that the action would not lie."

E It is clear that the decision turned on the true meaning of "consortium," and in the present case counsel for the defendants did not hesitate to say that the reason the present action will not lie is the reason stated by LORD WENSLEYDALE. He cited in support of his argument the passage from BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, vol. 3, ch. 8, p. 142, and, in particular, the words:

F "We may observe that in these relative injuries, [i.e., injuries suffered by a husband, a parent, a guardian or a master] notice is only taken of the wrong done to the superior of the parties related, . . . while the loss of the inferior [the wife, the child, the ward and the servant] by such injuries is totally unregarded."

G Counsel for the defendants was duly apologetic about quoting such language, which, it must be confessed, falls a little strangely on modern ears, but submitted that the husband's right to sue was because of his proprietary right, and the wife, lacking such proprietary right, had no such action.

H The decisions in what are usually called the enticement cases must be considered. Winsmore v. Greenbank (4) was an action brought on the case for enticing away and detaining the plaintiff's wife, for the loss of "the comfort and society" of the wife and "her aid and assistance in his domestic affairs." The Court of Common Pleas allowed the action, although the action for loss of consortium had formerly been considered as founded on trespass. In Gray v. Gee (6) it was held that a wife can maintain the action for enticement against anybody who persuades her husband to leave her. This was a most important decision, and would seem to be new in principle. It was followed in Place v. Searle (7) by the Court of Appeal. SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1932] 2 K.B. 512):

"It seems to be clear that at the present day a husband has the right to the consortium of his wife, and the wife to the consortium of her husband, and that each has a cause of action against a third party who, without justification destroys that consortium ”; and later he said (ibid., 513):

“ There being such a right it follows, and it has been so decided in numerous cases, that any person who, without justification, interferes with that right is liable to an action in tort.”

Whether SCRUTTON, L.J., intended to describe two different things in his use of the word “ destroys ” and the word “ interferes ” is not too clear. He may have meant an interference that destroys the consortium or he may have meant an interference that only injured and did not destroy. In Newton v. Hardy (8), SWIFT, J., held that a married woman had a legal right to the consortium of her husband and could recover damages from anybody who violated that right. He said (149 L.T. 166):

“ ... I cannot for myself think that now, as LORD CAMPBELL said in Lynch v. Knight (2) the right to sue for damaging the consortium is limited to the husband. It is a mutual right of husband and wife, and, if anybody breaks into it and violates it, then either of them, in my view, is entitled to sue for damages in respect of that wrong.”

I do not find that LORD CAMPBELL used the word “ damaging ”; it is always the loss of consortium. The passage is (9 H.L. Cas. 589):

“ Although this is a case of the first impression, if it can be shown that there is presented to us a concurrence of loss and injury from the act complained of, we are bound to say that this action lies. Nor can I allow that the loss of consortium, or conjugal society, can give a cause of action to the husband alone . . . But the loss of conjugal society is not a pecuniary loss, and I think it may be a loss which the law may recognise, to the wife as well as to the husband. The wife is not the servant of the husband . . . ”

As I say, I do not find that LORD CAMPBELL used the word “ damage.”

It would, therefore, appear to be plain that in the enticement cases the courts have recognised a legal right in the wife to the consortium of her husband, however the word is defined, but, in order to succeed in the action against anybody who procures, entices, or persuades the husband to forsake the consortium, she must show (a) that the person sued knew of the consortium; (b) that the person sued has done some wilful act to deprive the wife of the consortium; and (c) (more doubtfully) that a loss of the consortium must be proved, and not a mere impairment. Counsel for the defendants meets these formidable decisions by saying that they are consistent with the wife's rights in ecclesiastical law or the rights which spring from the religious or quasi-contractual side of marriage. The difficulty about that argument is that no such distinction is made in the cases, and SWIFT, J., was expressly basing himself on LORD CAMPBELL in Lynch v. Knight (2).

The second difficulty arises from applying the view of LORD WENSLEYDALE or the view of BLACKSTONE to the year 1951. As ISAACS, J., said in Wright v. Cedzich (5) (43 C.L.R. 505):

“ When we see that women are admitted to the capacity of commercial and professional life in most of its branches, that they are received on equal terms with men as voters and legislators, that they act judicially, can hold property, may sue and be sued alone, may and frequently have to provide a home and maintain a family, when too, they are organised in time of national danger as virtual combatants in defence of the country, it is time, I think, to abandon the assertion that in the eye of the law they are merely the adjuncts or property or the servants of their husbands . . . ”

This language was used twenty years ago, and the legislation of the past twenty years makes the position of the wife even stronger than it was when ISAACS, J., used the words quoted. The argument of counsel for the defendants must be carefully considered, because it may be thought that the word "consortium," when used in the enticement cases, has a much wider connotation than in the cases where the husband sued for loss of consortium, and, now that the wife may sue without joining her husband, it is reasonable to permit her to sue for the loss of the companionship of marriage. In Guy v. Livesey (9) the claim was for loss of consortium only for injuries done to the wife "per quod consortium uxoris suae for three days amisit" and in Hyde v. Scysson (10) the element of "servitium" does not seem to have been very prominent.

If I may assemble and summarise the arguments at this stage, for the wife it is said: (a) The enticement cases have established, as SCRUTTON, L.J., said in Elliott v. Albert (11), a well-established cause of action to a wife where the defendant has deprived her of the consortium of her husband. (b) "servitium" in the narrowest sense was never an essential ingredient of the husband's action for loss of consortium: it was at the most an adjunct. (c) The common law in 1951, in accordance with its flexible and adaptable characteristics, should take account of the modern status of the wife and the "services" which the husband renders to the wife as well as the "services" the wife renders to the husband, and say that it is no longer possible to view the wife as an inferior in BLACKSTONE'S use of the word, and that the historical precedents are no longer binding. (d) To allow the wife a right to recover for the loss of her consortium against those who have committed a wrong against her husband is not a new principle, but is merely new in the instance. The arguments against the wife would appear to be: (a) In no case has a wife ever succeeded in an action of this nature. (i) The wife is not, nor has she ever been, entitled to the services of her husband, which is the foundation of the action; (ii) although the wife has a similar interest in the society of and sexual relations with her husband as he has in such relations with her, the law has never recognised her right to recover against one who has caused harm to such interests by conduct not intended to harm them; (iii) the enticement actions are based on the intentional violation of a legal right and not otherwise, and have no bearing on the question of negligence towards a husband occasioning loss of consortium to the wife. (b) The husband is under a duty to support his wife according to his station in life, and recovers in his action for negligence as an element in his damages for any impairment of his ability to perform his obligation, and thus the wife recovers indirectly the value of any loss of her consortium. (c) The injury to the wife's consortium is not a direct consequence of the negligence alleged, and is too remote and consequential to be assessed in money. (d) Where the claim is for damages for loss of sexual intercourse the courts will not entertain it. If they did so, they would be faced with a multiplicity of actions in every case where a husband was injured for the loss of sexual intercourse for a fortnight or for a year, and into such relationships between husband and wife the courts will not enter. (e) The wife's interest in the marital relationship is not a right of property or derived from a contract, and it lies within an area into which the law will not enter except of necessity.

The conclusions to which I have come have not been reached without some hesitancy and doubt, which may, perhaps, be pardoned as natural in this highly controversial field. It would appear from the history of the husband's action for loss of consortium that it was a very anomalous thing, and, that being so, it ought not to be extended. This would leave the husband in the possession of a cause of action which was denied to the wife, and that is a position I am not prepared to take up. The husband's cause of action, if based on the idea of "servitium," is based on a view of the law which, in my opinion, is quite obsolete and discredited. It is quite impossible to reconcile it with modern thought and modern ideas. LORD WENSLEYDALE could say that the position of a wife resembled that of a hired domestic, tutor or governess. It is much to be doubted whether anybody today would subscribe to such language or feel it to be in conformity with the recognised and established position of the wife. In so far, therefore, as a distinction in law is sought to be made between the position of a husband and that of a wife in the matter of consortium on the ground that the husband has a proprietary interest in the wife whereas the wife has no corresponding interest in the husband, I am of opinion that it no longer has any application. I think, further, that the decision in the enticement cases, and the character of the legislation passed in the last seventy years have made a decisive change. The cases which have given the wife the right to sue when an intentional or a malicious act has resulted in the loss of her consortium must apply, I think, when the action is negligent as distinct from intentional. If it is said that the services a wife renders to the husband are an element of the consortium. This would seem to be a most arbitrary separation of the elements of consortium, for it cannot be doubted that a husband renders services to the wife, and the exclusion of the wife from any remedy can only be based on what I regard as a quite obsolete view of proprietary interest. So long as the husband is given the cause of action, I cannot see any good reason why the wife should be deprived of it. I am of opinion, therefore, that today the rights of husband and wife in the consortium are fully mutual and completely equal, and, before the law, the wife is entitled to bring an action when she has been deprived of her consortium by the negligent act of a third person.

I have left to the last what I regard as the most important and the most difficult question in the case. The plaintiff claimed originally for loss of the consortium, but by an amendment of the statement of claim she claimed damages for interference with her consortium. The question is whether it is enough to show some impairment of the consortium or whether a loss must be proved. It was admitted in this case that the husband and wife were living together under the same roof and to that extent at least the consortium still existed. It was contended, not that the wife had lost the consortium of her husband, but that one element of it, and a most important element, that of sexual intercourse, had been taken away, with all the consequences that entailed in the loss of children and the full family life. It was contended that that was an unjustifiable interference with the consortium, for which the wife could claim damages. At first sight it would seem to be a logical thing to say that, if a wife has a legal right to the consortium of her husband, then she would have a remedy for any unjustifiable interference or disturbance or impairment of it, but I do not think that the matter is quite as simple as this. There would appear to be no case where damages have been recovered save for the loss, as distinct from any impairment, of the consortium. The American RE-STATEMENT OF THE LAW OF TORTS, vol. 3, p. 693, says that "The husband is also entitled to recover damages for the loss of his wife's society and companionship in the home, including any impairment of her capacity for sexual relations"

"The wife has a similar interest in the society and sexual relations with her husband as he has in such relations with her. However, the law has not recognised her right to recover against one who has caused harm to such interests by conduct which is not intended to harm them."

This statement does more than assert the proprietary interest of the husband alone. It assumes that the consortium may be split up and the various strands which are interwoven into the whole may be separated and dealt with singly and apart. The view I am inclined to hold is that consortium cannot be dealt with in that way. The history of the action giving the husband his rights shows its somewhat artificial character. If consortium is to be capable of separation into many and extremely diverse elements, so that the impairment of any one element, however slight, will give a cause of action, then the prospects are rather overwhelming. Companionship, love, affection, comfort, mutual services, sexual intercourse—all belong to the married state. Taken together they make up the consortium, but I cannot think that the loss of one element, however grievous it may be, as it undoubtedly is in the present case, can be regarded as the loss of the consortium within the meaning of the decided cases. Still less could any impairment of one of the elements be so regarded. Consortium, I think, is one and indivisible. The law gives a remedy for its loss, but for nothing short of that. For these reasons I think the plaintiff's case fails, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J.: I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of BIRKETT, L.J. I agree entirely with the conclusion he has reached, that an action by a wife based on loss of consortium owing to the negligent, but not malicious, act of a third party causing injury to her husband cannot succeed unless the wife can prove loss, as distinct from impairment, of that consortium. I must, however, add that I entertain some doubt whether even proof of total loss of consortium would enable a wife to succeed where that loss was due to a negligent, as distinct from a malicious, act of the defendant.

The husband's right to recover in the converse case is, no doubt, now so clearly established that, at any rate in this court, it must be recognised. It seems to me, however, an anomaly. The whole idea of the right of consortium is a vague right. There is nothing concrete about it, with the consequence that a person may trespass on that right without knowing of its existence for he may not know that the wife is a married woman. It is difficult to see on what principle the right was recognised. It is to be observed, however, that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, in every case where the right was recognised the action was for loss of consortium et servitium. The ratio decidendi may, therefore, have been that, the husband being entitled to the services of his wife, she was in a certain sense to be regarded as his property. Anyone, therefore, who interfered with that property trespassed on it. This view derives support from BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND. Describing the nature of the action, he says, in vol. 3, at p. 140:

“... if the beating or other maltreatment be very enormous, so that thereby the husband is deprived for any time of the company and assistance of his wife, the law then gives him a separate remedy by an action upon the case for this ill-usage per quod consortium amisit, in which he shall recover a satisfaction in damages.”

Explaining why at that time no corresponding right was recognised in the wife, BLACKSTONE says (ibid., 142):

“One reason for which may be this: that the inferior hath no kind of property in the company, care or assistance of the superior, as the superior is held to have in those of the inferior. The wife cannot recover damages for beating her husband, for she hath no separate interest in anything during her coverture.”

This view of the position of the wife is now, as BIRKETT, L.J., points out, entirely obsolete, and it is no longer true that a wife has no separate interest in anything during her coverture. None the less, I do not think it necessarily follows that the courts must now recognise a right in the wife entirely corresponding to that of the husband. No doubt, in the enticement cases we are bound to do so in view of the decision of this court in Place v. Searle (7), but in the enticement cases intentional infringement of the rights of the consort is an essential ingredient in the cause of action. The remedy in that case may, therefore, be treated as a natural extension of the principle in Lumley v. Gye (12). Moreover, no injustice can be done to the defendant, since, ex hypothesi, his action was malicious. In cases such as the one before us, however, it is impossible to suggest any malice against the wife on behalf of the defendant or any intentional interference with her right of consortium. Moreover, the wife has never had any right of servitium vis-a-vis her husband. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be an extension of a line of decisions, in itself anomalous, if we were, in such cases as the present, to recognise a right of action in a wife corresponding to that which the courts have recognised as vested in a husband.

In Re Compton (13) an attempt was made to extend the line of decisions upholding gifts in favour of the poor relations of a testator to gifts providing for the education of a class of children descended from certain families related to a testatrix. In the lower court I upheld the validity of the gift, saying, in effect, that I could see no distinction in principle between gifts for poor relations of a testator and gifts for the education of a class of his relations since relief of poverty and education were both charitable objects in the eyes of the law. This court, however, reversed my decision. LORD GREENE, M.R., after suggesting a possible distinction on the ground of some special quality in gifts for the relief of poverty, said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 206):

"Failing such a ground of distinction, I can only regard the poor relations cases as anomalous and I prefer to let them remain as such rather than to extend the anomaly to a different class of case."

So, here, I think, it may be said that the right of the husband to recover damages in cases such as are indicated by the third count in BULLEN AND LEAKE, 3rd ed., p. 340, is an anomaly and ought not to be extended to the case of an action by the wife. True it is, as BIRKETT, L.J., points out, that this involves the recognition of a distinction between the respective rights of husband and of wife which is contrary to current opinion, but it has never been held that the wife has any right of servitium from the husband, and an extension of the principle to actions by the wife seems to me to involve real hardship on a defendant who will have already paid damages to the husband, in assessing which allowance will, I think, have been made for the impairment of his ability to perform his obligation to support his wife. I, therefore, agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE (read by COHEN, L.J.): I agree with the conclusions reached by BIRKETT, L.J., but reach them by a slightly different route. Until the nineteen twenties the overwhelming weight of the authorities, English and American, was opposed to the existence of any such cause of action in the wife as is claimed in this case. There is, in my mind, no doubt that, until that time at least, medieval notions persisted according to which the rights of a husband as against a wife were entirely different from those of a wife as against her husband. He was, and is still, under a duty to maintain her. She was, and is, under no duty, except in rare cases under statutes dealing with the poor law, to maintain him—a logical enough arrangement when the whole of her property vested in him on marriage. He was entitled to damages against any man with whom she committed adultery. She had no reciprocal right against an intervener. She owed him, theoretically, "services"—"servitium." He owed her none. The relationship still in law retained the impress of the primitive notion that the wife, her "services," and the comfort of her society—her "consortium" and "servitium"—were the property of the husband, any encroachment on which conferred on him a cause of action in the nature of trespass: see BULLEN AND LEAKE, 3rd ed., p. 340, and BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, 21st ed., vol. 3, p. 138.

Among pre-1920 cases only in Lynch v. Knight (2) is it even suggested that the wife had a similar right to her husband's consortium, and in that case violation of consortium figured, not as a cause of action available to the wife, but as a possible head of damage in respect of a slander published concerning her, and the main point was left undetermined since it was held that the husband's abandonment of the wife was not a natural or probable result of the slander. In the nineteen-twenties several cases were decided on the very different issue of enticement, and for the first time the wife was held to possess rights in the consortium of her husband sufficient to vest in her a right of action in respect of his enticement corresponding to the right of action which for centuries the husband had possessed for the wife's enticement. The cause of action was entirely different from that which a husband had for "trespass" to his consortium. It was a cause of action in case, and the action would not lie unless the enticer could be shown to have known that the enticed party was married and that the enticement was a conscious and intentional invasion of the consortium. In this different connection, two out of three judges of the Court of Appeal did in Place v. Searle (7) state that the wife had the same right to the husband's consortium as he had to hers. It seems questionable whether, in relation to the wholly different cause of action involved in this case, where knowledge and intention are, as in trespass generally, irrelevant, those statements amount to more than dicta. Ninety-nine per cent. of the American decisions, as well as the RE-STATEMENT OF THE LAW OF TORTS, emphatically negative any such right in the wife as is claimed in this case, and I agree with COHEN, L.J., whose judgment I have read, that, if the husband's own right had first come in question as res integra today, it would probably have been negatived. As it is, the husband's right being deeply entrenched in authority and the wife's never having been affirmed, I think that the intervention of the legislature would be needed to produce equity either by abolishing the husband's cause of action or by retaining it and conferring a similar cause of action on the wife. I do not believe that at present the wife has such a cause of action as is claimed. Whether she ought to is, of course, quite another question.

If I am wrong and she has, it requires, in my view, a total, even though temporary, loss of consortium to constitute it. No case can be found in actions by the husband where, some separable constituent element only of the consortium being destroyed, an action has been held to lie. Consortium is, in my view, one and indiscerptible. The alternative view, the view that you can disengage a particular strand in the consortial bond and say that, because that strand has been severed, that is enough—in other words, the view that impairment of the consortium as opposed to destruction of it will suffice—finds no support in the precedents and leads to insoluble problems in practice. Is a wife to be entitled to sue her husband's employer because, through his negligence, her husband has been lamed, and hence that element of their consortium which consisted in long country walks which they used to share has perished? This seems to me wrong. No one disputes the importance of the particular ingredient in the consortium which has been extinguished in this case, which includes the wife's capacity to bear children in wedlock, but, once you permit the segregation of a particular ingredient and say that when that has gone the consortium has gone, you enter a region of extreme perplexity and complication. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

LACEY v. W. SILK & SON, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), January 12, 15, May 11, 1951.]

Legal Aid—Certificate—Power of local committee to ante-date—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 2 (2), reg. 5 (14).

A local committee under the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, have no power to ante-date a certificate for legal aid, and any certificate so ante-dated is invalid.

FOR THE LEGAL AID AND ADVICE ACT, 1949, s. 1, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Continuation Vol., 1949, p. 469.

FOR THE LEGAL AID (GENERAL) REGULATIONS, 1950, regs. 1, 2 and 5, see BUTTERWORTH'S EMERGENCY LEGISLATION SERVICE, Second Binder, Title Courts [8], pp. 506, 507.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

On the Saturday between the first and the second day's hearing of the action a certificate of legal aid under the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, made under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, was issued to the plaintiff. Judgment was subsequently given for the defendants and the question of costs was deferred. Two days later the plaintiff's solicitors obtained the issue of a second legal aid certificate, dated about a month before the hearing, in place of the original certificate. For the plaintiff it was contended that, the plaintiff having complied with the terms on which the local committee under the Act had decided to issue the certificate some time before hearing, the duty to issue the certificate arose at that time and the certificate must be deemed to have been issued on the date on which that duty arose. The defendants contended that there was no power to issue two legal aid certificates in respect of the same matter or to ante-date a certificate.

Chope for the plaintiff.

N. G. L. Richards for the defendants.

May 11. SLADE, J.: This is an industrial injury case in which I gave judgment for the defendants on Monday, Jan 15, 1951. Counsel concurred in an application that I should defer dealing with the costs of the action until the position had been investigated in the light of the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950.

At some date between Oct. 2 and Nov. 24, 1950, the plaintiff applied under the regulations for legal aid, and on Nov. 24, 1950, the local committee decided to grant him a legal aid certificate on terms subsequently embodied in a form, B.1, dated Dec. 1, 1950. Those terms included a requirement that the plaintiff should consent to make a contribution towards the costs of prosecuting the action, which had been commenced on Feb. 2, 1950, in the form of specified weekly payments. Within the prescribed time the plaintiff accepted the requirements of Form B.1 and started to make payments in accordance with the specified contribution. The hearing of the action started on Friday, Jan. 12, continued throughout that day and was adjourned till the following Monday, Jan. 15. On Saturday, Jan. 13, the local committee issued to the plaintiff a legal aid certificate which was dated that day. Its existence was not communicated to counsel for the defendants until after I had concluded my judgment on the Monday. I have not seen the certificate issued by the local committee on Jan. 13. After I had adjourned the case for legal argument on the question of costs the plaintiff's solicitors were perturbed on finding that the legal aid certificate was not dated or issued until Jan. 13, i.e., after the first day's hearing of the action had been concluded on Jan. 12, and a representative of the plaintiff's solicitors communicated with the authorities, as a result of which, on Jan. 17 the local committee issued what purported to be another legal aid certificate which was dated Dec. 15, 1950. The certificate of Jan. 13 was handed back to them and they retained it, and, no doubt, the certificate of Jan. 17 was issued to supersede it.

I need hardly say that the issue of the two certificates and the ante-dating of the second certificate from Jan. 17, 1951, to Dec. 15, 1950, was done with the best possible motive, but I have to consider the legal effect of that state of affairs on the liability of the unsuccessful plaintiff for the defendants' costs. Counsel for the defendants said that he was prepared to concede for the purposes of his argument that the certificate would operate from the date of its issue, Jan. 13, and not from the time when the fact of its issue was communicated to him, and, as the certificate was issued on Jan. 13, he would not ask for the costs of Monday, Jan. 15, but he claimed to be entitled to the costs of the action up to and including Friday, Jan. 12. Apart from matters affecting legal aid, I should have given judgment for the defendants with costs in the exercise of my discretion under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 1. Counsel for the defendants submitted that there was no jurisdiction to issue two legal aid certificates except where an emergency certificate was issued followed within the prescribed time by a definitive certificate. Secondly, he said that, if he was wrong in that contention, still less was there power to issue a certificate, whether a first certificate or a second certificate, and to ante-date it.

Regulation 1 (3) defines an "assisted person" as "a person in respect of whom a certificate is in force."

The same paragraph defines a "certificate" as being

"a certificate issued in accordance with these regulations entitling a person to legal aid . . . and includes an emergency certificate issued under the provisions of reg. 10."

Reading those two definitions of "assisted person" and of the word "certificate" together I construe an "assisted person" as meaning a person in respect of whom a certificate issued in accordance with these regulations is in force, i.e., the certificate must (i) have been issued and (ii) be in force. Regulation 2 (1) provides:

"Legal aid shall be available to any person to whom a certificate has been issued."

I emphasise the past tense because of the argument addressed to me by counsel for the plaintiff. Regulation 2 (2) provides:

"Any document purporting to be a certificate issued in accordance with these regulations shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to be a valid certificate issued to the person named therein."

To deal with the first contention for the defendants, viz., that there was no jurisdiction to issue a second certificate, I refer to reg. 5. This regulation is headed "Issue of Certificates" and para. (14) provides:

"When an applicant has complied with such of the provisions of paras. (11), (12) and (13) of this regulation as are relevant to his case the local committee shall issue to him a certificate in Form 1 . . ."

I am unable to derive much assistance from the use of the singular number in that paragraph because reg. 1 (2) provides:

"The Interpretation Act, 1889, shall apply to the interpretation of these regulations as it applies to the interpretation of an Act of Parliament."

And the Interpretation Act, 1889, provides that the singular shall include the plural.

Counsel for the defendants next argued that in reg. 10, which deals with emergency certificates, there is provision in paras. (8), (9) and (10) for the issue of what I may call a substantive certificate to replace an emergency certificate, and an express provision in para. (10) that a certificate issued under para. (8) shall bear the same date as the emergency certificate. That is not strictly an ante-dating of a certificate. It is the issuing of a replacement certificate to relate back to the date of the emergency certificate which it replaces. I do not find it necessary to decide whether in any circumstances a legal aid certificate once issued and dated can be superseded in respect of the same proceedings by another legal aid certificate bearing the date on which it is issued, because I think the second contention of counsel for the defendants is correct, that is, assuming, without deciding, that a local committee or an area committee have power to supersede by a second certificate, a legal aid certificate already issued, they have no power to ante-date the second certificate.

Counsel for the plaintiff said that the words in reg. 5 (14), "the local committee shall issue" a certificate to an applicant on his compliance with the requirements of that paragraph, impose a statutory obligation on the local committee to issue the certificate, and, if for some time after that duty has arisen they refrain from doing so, the certificate, when ultimately issued, must be deemed to have been issued at the time when the duty first arose. It is unnecessary to decide whether "shall" in that context, imposes on the local committee a duty to act in accordance with reg. 5 (14) which can be enforced by mandamus, or whether, if the non-performance of that duty results in damage, there is any remedy. Those are matters between the applicant and the authorities responsible for the administration of the Act and are res inter alios acta as between the plaintiff and the defendants to the action, but I am unable to accept the argument that "shall issue" means that from the moment the duty arises a certificate which has not in fact been issued shall be deemed to have been issued. I construe the words in reg. 2 (1) that

"Legal aid shall be available to any person to whom a certificate has been issued in accordance with these regulations," as meaning that legal aid shall not be available to any person to whom a certificate has not been issued in accordance with the regulations. Moreover, the grant of legal aid after proceedings have been commenced is dealt with by reg. 13 (1) which provides:

"Where, after proceedings have been instituted in any court, any party becomes an assisted person in regard to those proceedings, the provisions of s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act (which relates to the liability of an assisted person by virtue of an order for costs made against him) shall apply only to so much of the costs of the proceedings as are incurred while a certificate is in force."

These considerations are sufficient to decide the question before me.

Counsel for the plaintiff conceded that the certificate of Jan. 17, 1951, ante-dated to Dec. 15, 1950, could not be regarded as an amendment of the certificate originally issued on Jan. 13, 1951. Regulation 2 (2) provides:

"Any document purporting to be a certificate issued in accordance with these regulations shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to be a valid certificate issued to the person named therein."

I hold that by the agreed facts and dates the contrary has been proved, and that the certificate issued on Jan. 17, 1951, was not issued in accordance with the regulations and so was not valid because it bore a date ante-dating it by more than a month before the date on which it was in fact issued. I give judgment for the defendants with the costs of the action up to and including Jan. 12, 1951, and as counsel for the defendants does not ask for any costs under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, I direct there shall be no order as to the costs of the hearing of Monday, Jan. 15, 1951.

Re WEBB. SANDOM v. WEBB.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.),
April 20, 23, May 11, 1951.]

Easement—Implied reservation—Lease—Display of advertisements on outer wall of demised premises—No reservation of advertising rights over outer wall—Permissive user for more than ten years before grant of lease.

The landlord was the head-lessee of business premises of which he occupied the ground floor where he carried on the business of a butcher and provision merchant. By a lease dated Aug. 11, 1949, the tenant held the first and second floors of the premises for a term of twenty-one years for use exclusively as a hairdressing saloon. The tenancy covered the outer walls of the upper floors of the premises so that they passed to the tenant for the term of the lease, but there was no covenant by either the landlord or the tenant to maintain the outer walls, nor was there any reservation in the landlord's favour of advertising or other rights as regards the use of the exterior surfaces of the walls. Between 1939 and 1949 the tenant had been in occupation of the two floors in question under tenancy agreements and during that time the landlord had maintained two advertisements on the outside of the demised premises with the full knowledge of the tenant and without any complaint or claim on his part.

HELD: prima facie the landlord could not assert against the tenant any right which was not expressly reserved to him in the lease; the maintenance of the advertisements during the term was not a necessary incident of his user of the ground floor for his business, nor the bare circumstance that the advertisements were not only present at the date of the grant of the lease, but had been continuously present without objection by the tenant since the commencement of his original tenancy in 1939, sufficient to raise an inference that at the date of the lease it was the common intention of the parties to reserve to him the right to continue to display the advertisements; and, therefore, the landlord had failed to discharge the onus, which was on him, to show that a reservation of the right must be implied and the general rule did not apply.

Suffield v. Brown (1864) (4 De G.J. & Sm. 185); Wheeldon v. Burrows (1879) (12 Ch.D. 31); and Crossley & Sons, Ltd. v. Lightowler (1867) (2 Ch. App. 478), applied.

Simpson v. Weber (1925) (133 L.T. 46), criticised and distinguished.

Per JENKINS, L.J.: As to the law applicable to the case, it is not disputed that as a general rule a grantor, whether by way of conveyance or lease, or part of a hereditament in his ownership, cannot claim any easement over the part granted for the benefit of the part retained unless it is expressly reserved out of the grant: see, e.g., Suffield v. Brown, Crossley & Sons, Ltd. v. Lightowler, and Wheeldon v. Burrows. There are, however, certain exceptions to the general rule. Two well-established exceptions relate to easements of necessity and mutual easements such as rights of support between adjacent buildings. It is, however, recognised in the authorities that these two specific exceptions do not exhaust the list, which is, indeed, incapable of exhaustive statement as the circumstances of any particular case may be such as to raise a necessary inference that the common intention of the parties must have been to reserve some easement to the grantor or such as to preclude the grantee from denying the right consistently with good faith, and there appears to be no doubt that where circumstances such as these are clearly established the court will imply the appropriate reservation.

APPEAL by the tenant from a decision of DANCKWERTS, J., dated Oct. 5, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 828.

The tenant took out an originating summons for the determination of the question whether, on the true construction of a lease and in the events which had happened, the landlord was entitled to use without the consent of the tenant for the purpose of advertising the outer walls, or any and if so what portion or portions of the outer walls, of the property demised by the lease. The learned judge held that the outer walls were included in the demise, but in the circumstances there was to be implied in the lease an easement to display two advertisements which were in existence at the date of the lease, and to repair and generally to maintain them. The facts are fully stated in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Mulligan for the tenant.

Richmount and Spears for the landlord.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The question raised in the present appeal is that stated in the originating summons dated Mar. 27, 1950, issued by the tenant against the landlord, viz.:

"Whether, on the true construction of the lease dated Aug. 11, 1949, and made between the landlord of the one part and the tenant of the other part and in the events which have happened, the landlord is entitled, until the determination of the lease, to use for the purpose of advertising the outer walls and if so what portions or portion of the outer walls of the property demised by the lease without consent of the tenant."

The emphasis in the language I have quoted is on the phrase "and in the events which have happened," for there is no question of the construction of the lease itself. The point is whether "in the events which have happened" there is an implied reservation in favour of the landlord of a right (stating it loosely at this stage) to maintain advertisements on the walls of the premises the subject of the demise in favour of the tenant. DANCKWERTS, J., came to a conclusion in favour of such a reservation. He said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 831):

"... it appears to me to be common sense to imply an intention on the part of the parties that [those advertisements] should remain."

B In the circumstances of the case the strength of the appeal to common sense is not negligible, but in the light of the authorities binding on this court I have found myself unable to agree with the learned judge and I think that this appeal must succeed. The landlord by his counsel in the course of the argument complained of the form of the proceedings as being inappropriate to the problem which we are called on to determine. Particularly he complained that in the proceedings

C there was no opportunity for him, as an alternative weapon of defence, to counter-claim for rectification. It is true that the evidence before us is of a very meagre character. It does not seem to me, however, that the landlord can fairly complain of that. He was the lessor under the relevant lease which he must be taken to have proffered, and admittedly the onus must be on him to establish any implied reservation in his favour. The application was supported by a brief affidavit

D on the tenant's part in which (inter alia) he swore that he had never granted to the landlord any right, or otherwise any easement or licence over, or for, or in respect of, the user of the outer walls of the demised premises. No application to cross-examine the tenant was made by the landlord who contented himself by filing a still briefer affidavit containing no evidence whatever relating to the circumstances in which the lease was granted and stating in the last paragraph

E that he contends and will contend that when the tenant took possession of the premises he "was well aware of the presence of both advertisements complained of and in taking no exception to them then it is contended that he acquiesced and entered into a tenancy agreement with the landlord, accepting the landlord's rights to continue to have the benefit of both the advertisements."

F We have, therefore, to decide the case on the material before us. Our decision must necessarily be related to those facts and cannot be regarded as extending beyond them to cover other cases in which much fuller material might be before the court. Our decision, moreover, must be without prejudice to any claim the landlord may have to rectify the lease or to any point he may be able or entitled to raise on any application by the tenant for an accourt or an injunction or otherwise by way of enforcement of his rights. The facts as proved by the limited evidence to which I have referred are as follows. The landlord appears to be, and to have been, at all material times, the head-lessee of the premises known as 405, Footscray Road, New Eltham. The lease or leases have not been before the court, nor is there any evidence of their terms. The premises, in fact, consist

G of a site and building on the corner of Footscray Road and Avery Hill Road, and the landlord has at all material times carried on upon the ground floor of the premises his business as a shopkeeper, selling meat, grocery and provisions under his own name. The premises are in the shape, as it were, of half a hexagon, of which the centre and smallest side faces diagonally across the corner of the two roads. The entrance to the landlord's shop occupies the ground floor of this side. In 1939 the upper part of these premises was let to the tenant by the landlord. The terms of the tenancy (which was for a period of three years) are contained in a short agreement. I find it unnecessary to refer to this document except to say that it contained no provision for the repair or upkeep of the exterior of the premises demised, no reference to the head lease, and no reference to any means of access to the premises demised, such access, apparently, being obtained in fact through a door in the west side of the ground floor in Avery Hill Road. The tenant continued in occupation, presumably according to the terms of this contract, until the grant of the lease now in question on Aug. 11, 1949. In fact, during the whole of this ten-years period, and, indeed, ever since, the landlord has maintained two advertisements on the outside of the premises demised without (as is conceded) any complaint or claim on the part of the tenant. The first advertisement consists of an advertisement of the landlord's own business painted on the bricks of the middle and shortest side of the premises and occupying the whole of that side. The second is an advertisement of Brymay safety matches, apparently contained in a wooden frame, attached to part of the western wall of the premises. From the photograph with which we have been supplied, it appears that on the top side of the frame is printed the word "Boro." It is not in evidence and does not appear whether the area covered by the frame, which is considerable, is limited to the wall above the ground floor (or, as seems probable) starts below the level of the first floor. It extends nearly to the top or cornice of the first floor.

On Aug. 11, 1949, as already indicated, the relevant lease was entered into between the landlord and the tenant. The subject-matter was the same as that comprised in the earlier tenancy agreement, that is, "the first and second floors of the building situate in and being No. 405, Footscray Road, New Eltham." The term was twenty-one years from Mar. 25, 1949, and the amount of the rent was substantially increased by comparison with that previously payable. The lease is a somewhat elaborate document. There are covenants as regards upkeep, delivery up, against making alterations, etc., and (on the landlord's part) for quiet enjoyment. All these covenants, which are in common form, were inserted without, perhaps, too close a regard to the precise nature of the transaction. There was also inserted a covenant on the part of the tenant not to use or permit the demised premises to be used for any purpose other than as a hairdressing saloon without the consent in writing of the landlord first had and obtained. This last covenant constituted a new obligation on the tenant. The lease followed, however, the unhappy example of the preceding contract in omitting any reference to means of access and (more important for present purposes) any reference whatever to the exterior of the premises. Thus, there was no covenant by either the landlord or the tenant to maintain the outer walls, but in this instance (and this was again a new departure) there was a covenant by the landlord to perform and observe all the covenants, etc., affecting the demised premises

"which are contained in the superior lease of the premises of which the premises hereby demised form a part dated Mar. 25, 1949, and made between Cyril Frederick Keen of the one part and the lessor of the other part and on the part of the lessor to be performed and observed."

This reference is the only information available as regards the superior lease, and it is to be noted that its term also ran from Mar. 25, 1949. It may, therefore, no doubt be assumed that the grant of the lease under consideration was connected with the grant to the landlord of a new head lease. It seems also likely enough that the covenants in the head lease (which the landlord undertook to observe) included a covenant as regards maintenance of the exterior. Apart, however, from these surmises there is no evidence whatsoever of the circumstances in which the present lease was granted or of any negotiations leading up to it. It has been conceded by the landlord that, notwithstanding the silence of the lease in this respect, the demise covered the outer walls of the upper floors of the premises so that they passed to the tenant for the term of the lease. There is no other question of construction of the document. Neither by its expressed terms, nor by necessary implication, can there possibly be extracted from the document itself any kind of reservation in the landlord's favour as regards the use of the walls. As I have said above, the tenant in his affidavit states that he never agreed to any grant of a right for the landlord to maintain advertisements. On the other hand, the landlord, by his answer, relies on his user in fact for the preceding ten years, although he has made no suggestion of any agreement or discussion in regard to the advertisements or of any mutual intention that he should be entitled to retain them.

Matters continued as before until the beginning of 1950 when the tenant (whose hairdressing business does not seem to have been entirely successful) appears to have woken up to the possibilities which the advertisements presented to him. On Jan. 23, 1950, his solicitors wrote to Bryant & May, Ltd., calling attention to the fact that ever since March, 1939, they had had an advertisement on the west wall of the premises, but that the tenant had received no payment therefor. The solicitors asked, accordingly, for particulars of any payments made and requested that all future payments should be made to the tenant. As a result, the tenant learnt from Bryant & May, Ltd., that, according to their understanding, the advertising site had been "leased" to the Borough Billposting Co., Holborn House, High Holborn, to whom Bryant & May, Ltd., had always paid their rental. The tenant's solicitors, accordingly, communicated with the Borough Billposting Co. and they, in turn, stated that they had been in occupation of the site for many years, having obtained a "licence" for such purpose from the landlord. No further information is before the court of the nature of the arrangement subsisting between the landlord and the Borough Billposting Co.

The question then is whether, having regard to the apparent and continuous user by the landlord (or those under contract with him) with the full knowledge of the tenant, there ought to be implied the reservation which the landlord seeks. Beyond the facts of user and of the tenant's acquiescence, there is no other relevant consideration. As I have already indicated, the authorities, in my judgment, compel me to hold that the landlord has failed to establish any sufficient ground for an implied reservation in his favour.

The first question is: What is the reservation sought to be implied? It is at this point that the landlord's difficulties appear to me to begin. As regards the use of the corner wall by the landlord for advertising his own business, the only claim made by him through his counsel is a right personal to himself to maintain on that wall the existing advertisement, or some other advertisement substantially identical. As regards the Brymay advertisement, the landlord has put his claim in more than one way. First, he says that he is entitled to a personal right to maintain that advertisement and no other. Secondly, and alternatively, he claims a personal right to continue to license or let to the Borough Billposting Co. the site of the present advertisement for any advertisements which the Borough Billposting Co. may in turn authorise. Thirdly, he suggested (but this claim has not been persisted in before us) that there was reserved a right to him and his assigns, persons entitled to the reversion expectant on the tenant's lease, to maintain on the site of the Brymay advertisement any advertisement or advertisements whatever. This is the landlord's first difficulty, for, if he is entitled to a implied reservation in his favour, it is essential that he should be able precisely to define its terms and character. Put alternatively, if the implication of a reservation is justified in order to give effect to what the parties must be presumed between them to have intended, the terms and nature of the reservation should be capable of certain statement. The landlord's case, however, presents a disconcerting ambiguity. There is, in the first place, a difference in quality between the right claimed by him in respect of the corner wall and that claimed in respect of the west wall. As regards the former, he claims a right personal to himself and limited by application to the business which he himself is now carrying on. As regards the latter, the right asserted is to let the space in question to others for advertisements unrelated to the landlord's own trade, and it is uncertain whether and to what extent such right is further qualified.

If the court were satisfied that in order to make the transaction between landlord and tenant sensible and effective according to its terms they must have intended some particular right to be reserved to the landlord, it might be possible to imply an appropriate reservation. Such a result might be said to be implicit in the language of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Pwllbach Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Woodman (1) ([1915] A.C. 646):

"The law will readily imply the grant or reservation of such easements as may be necessary to give effect to the common intention of the parties to a grant of real property, with reference to the manner or purposes in and for which the land granted or some land retained by the grantor is to be used: see Jones v. Pritchard (2) and Lyttelton Times Co., Ltd. v. Warners, Ltd. (3). But it is essential for this purpose that the parties should intend that the subject of the grant or the land retained by the grantor should be used in some definite and particular manner. It is not enough that the subject of the grant or the land retained should be intended to be used in a manner which may or may not involve this definite and particular use."

Whatever be the proper significance of the language I have quoted, the landlord's difficulty in the way of its application in the present case seems to me to be that the facts as proved in evidence, if they are consistent with such an implied reservation as the landlord claims, are equally consistent with a merely permissive privilege allowed by the tenant to the landlord and revocable by the tenant at any time. Such a reservation as the landlord claims is requisite, so far as I can see, for the effective enjoyment neither of the premises demised nor of the premises retained.

Ever since Suffield v. Brown (4) it has, in my judgment, been established that prima facie a grantor or lessor cannot assert against his grantee or lessee any right or privilege unless it has been expressly reserved to him by the grant. To this general rule there are, no doubt, exceptions, no less well established. Thus, a right of way to the grantor's premises will be impliedly reserved over the premises granted if it is necessary to enable access to the former to be had. Similarly, rights will be impliedly reserved which are in their nature reciprocal to rights which the grant must be taken to have conferred on the grantee. In Aldridge v. Wright (5) GREER, L.J., attempted an exhaustive classification of the rights which the courts will imply in favour of a grantor, none of which (as counsel concedes) can be said to cover the landlord's case here. Counsel for the landlord has argued, however, that there are further exceptions to the general rule. He says that a right in favour of a grantor will be implied either (a) whenever in all the circumstances it is equitable so to do, or (b) (and this may be a particular manifestation or example of his general exception) where there has been any failure on the part of the other party to perform such duty of disclosure as the circumstances of the case may have imposed on him. As regards the former alternative, the answer seems to me to be that such an alleged general equity would be inconsistent with the duty of express reservation which prima facie is imposed on the grantor, and, further, would render otiose and inappropriate the particular exceptions to the general rule which the court has made and precisely defined. For his second alternative counsel has particularly relied on the language of LORD BLACKBURN in his dissenting opinion in Russell v. Watts (6) (10 App. Cas. 613):

"LINDLEY, L.J., refers to Dann v. Spurrier (7) and Cotching v. Bassett (8), and he might have referred to Freeman v. Cooke (9) at law, as exemplifying the principle that where one man induces another to alter his position by active misleading, or by silence, where there is by contract, usage of trade, or otherwise, a duty to speak, or, in an equitable case, one may say, where the circumstances are such as to make it against conscience to be silent, his rights must be regulated by what he has himself brought about."

A In the present case counsel for the landlord has pointed to the somewhat remarkable facts to which I have already alluded—the ten years of user by the landlord from 1939 to 1949 with the full knowledge of the tenant and without any complaint or claim on his part; the fact that the advertisement on the west wall was obviously (for the name "Boro" appeared on the frame) the subject of some letting or licence for reward, and the fact that such advertisement extended in part over the wall of the ground floor premises or at least was part of a larger advertisement which manifestly so extended; and the terms of the 1949 lease itself, including the obligation imposed on the tenant to use the premises demised solely for the purposes of a hairdressing saloon. From these facts counsel has submitted that, unless the tenant was intending to concede to the landlord the right which he claims, his failure to inform his lessor to the contrary when the lease was being negotiated and prepared was, in effect, an act of bad faith on his part. Whether silence on the part of a grantee at the time of or immediately prior to the grant to him would in the particular circumstances of any given case amount to bad faith, and whether, in such an event, the grantee would be treated as disabled in a court of equity from disputing the grantor's claim to an implied reservation, are matters on which it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion, for, in my judgment, those are not the circumstances relevant to the present case. In the absence, at any rate, of bad faith, it seems to me that such a duty as counsel says was imposed on the tenant is inconsistent with the general principles established by authority. For the existence of any such general duty, as counsel alleges, on the part of the grantee is, to my mind, inconsistent with the duty which, according to the cases, is imposed by the law on the grantor expressly to reserve any right which he desires to secure or maintain against the grantee. What, indeed, would be the character of the grantee's obligation? To draw the grantor's attention to his own duty? To warn him that in the absence of express reservation he will go without? Where (as seems likely enough in the present case) neither party ever had the matter in mind at all, is the grantee under a greater duty than the grantor to ascertain (and disclose) what might be the true legal position?

E I do not attempt for my part any exhaustive definition of the exceptions to the general rule. In my judgment, the general rule itself as formulated in the cases leaves no room for either of counsel's exceptions. I content myself by referring to the judgment of THESIGER, L.J., in this court in Wheeldon v. Burrows (10) (12 Ch.D. 49):

G "We have had a considerable number of cases cited to us, and out of them I think that two propositions may be stated as what I may call the general rules governing cases of this kind. The first of these rules is, that on the grant by the owner of a tenement of part of that tenement as it is then used and enjoyed, there will pass to the grantee all those continuous and apparent easements (by which, of course, I mean quasi easements), or, in other words, all those easements which are necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property granted, and which have been and are at the time of the grant used by the owners of the entirety for the benefit of the part granted. The second proposition is that, if the grantor intends to reserve any right over the tenement granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant. Those are the general rules governing cases of this kind, but the second of those rules is subject to certain exceptions. One of those exceptions is the well-known exception which attaches to cases of what are called ways of necessity; and I do not dispute for a moment that there may be, and probably are, certain other exceptions, to which I shall refer before I close my observations upon this case. Both of the general rules which I have mentioned are founded upon a maxim which is as well established by authority as it is consonant to reason and common sense, viz., that a grantor shall not derogate from his grant."

Again, after referring to Suffield v. Brown (4), THESIGER, L.J., quoted (ibid., 56) the observation of LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., in Crossley & Sons, Ltd. v. Lightowler (11) (2 Ch. App. 486):

"It appears to me to be an immaterial circumstance that the easement should be apparent and continuous, for non constat that the grantor does not intend to relinquish it unless he shows the contrary by expressly reserving it."

Finally, and in reference to what he had said in the course of the first passage from his judgment in Wheeldon v. Burrows (10), which I have quoted, THESIGER, L.J., reconciled certain other cases with the general propositions he had stated by adding as a second exception to his second proposition reciprocal easements of the kind already mentioned. He said (12 Ch.D. 59):

"It seems to me to be consistent with reason and common sense that these reciprocal easements should be implied . . ."

It remains only for me to say a word or two about Simpson v. Weber (12) which DANCKWERTS, J. ([1950] 2 All E.R. 830), regarded as being the "nearest case to the present" case and which he followed accordingly. The case (which was before the Divisional Court on appeal from a county court) is reported both at 41 T.L.R. 302 and 133 L.T. 46. Both reports are brief, and although the latter contains no report of the argument, it has seemed to me on the whole the better of the two. Nevertheless, the facts are, to my mind, in some degree obscure. The dispute was plainly of a most trivial character. The plaintiff and defendant were respectively successors in title of the grantee of a common owner and the common owner. There had been growing at all material times on the border of the defendant's tenement a Virginia creeper which had, according to its nature, attached itself to the plaintiff's easterly wall. At some time before action brought the growth of the creeper had obstructed a gutter of the plaintiff which the plaintiff had cleared, a matter to which the Divisional Court attributed the county court judge's award of 40s. damages. It is to be noted that the gutter in fact overhung the defendant's property although no point appears to have been made of this not unimportant fact. The other casus belli related to a gate-post of the defendant which was attached to the plaintiff's wall by nails or plugs, part of the length of which was inserted in the plaintiff's wall. I will not criticise the conclusion of the Divisional Court which reversed the judgment of the county court judge in the plaintiff's favour. There seems to me, however, all the difference in the world between a long-lived tree and a gate-post permanently attached to a wall, on the one hand, and temporary advertisements, on the other, and to the case of the tree the analogy of reciprocal easements might, perhaps, have been applied. In the course of his leading judgment SALTER, J., used the following language (133 L.T. 47):

"I have to ask, what was the intention of the parties in the present case as to whether the creeper was to remain and grow against the plaintiff's wall, and as to whether the gate-post was to remain fastened to it . . . I have come to the conclusion . . . that there was no evidence that it was not the intention of the parties that the creeper and gate-post should stay."

If by this language that learned judge intended to lay it down that in a case such as the present, while it is, or may be, reasonable for the court to assume that if the parties had applied their minds to the problem of the advertisements they would or should have made provision for securing to the landlord such right as he now claims, it is sufficient for the landlord to establish the absence of any evidence of a contrary intention, it seems to me that the proposition is in direct conflict with the principle which is not only well established but which also, in my judgment, ought not to be lightly qualified—the principle that it is the duty of a grantor to reserve expressly any right he wishes to maintain against his grantee or, at least, to prove affirmatively that such a reservation was clearly intended by him and his grantee at the time of the grant.

A Failing, as I think the landlord does, to establish the necessary condition, the question raised in the summons must necessarily, in my judgment, be answered in the negative. As I have earlier stated, however, my conclusion on the particular question raised for our consideration leaves unjudged the results which properly flow if the tenant seeks by asking for an account or otherwise to enforce the rights which, by reason of this judgment, he has. In the hope that in some measure further litigation and dispute may be saved, I add this. The proper conclusion from the facts now before the court appears to me to be that the landlord's activities, until challenged, ought to be regarded as having been by the tacit permission or licence of the tenant. That permission or licence was terminated when the tenant called in question the landlord's rights in January, 1950. So far as concerns the landlord's own advertisement on the middle or diagonal wall, it is painted on the bricks which (as the landlord concedes) are included in the demise. Prima facie that is all that has to be said—save that the landlord cannot henceforth renew the advertisement. The position of the C Brymay advertisement is less easy. We know nothing of the terms of the contract between the landlord and the Borough Billposting Co. Counsel for the tenant concedes that his client cannot—or cannot without exposing himself to liability—terminate or interfere with that contract. Where part of premises granted or demised is subject to an existing and valid tenancy or other agreement, prima facie, no doubt, the grantee or lessee would take subject to and with the benefit of that contract. In the present case the tenant's rights, on the facts, may not be so simple. If the tenant should be taken to have granted to the landlord a permission or licence to use the relevant space for advertising purposes by means (inter alia) of letting it for reasonably short terms to advertising contractors, it may well be that he could not recall his permission or licence so as to attract to himself the profits of any pending contract entered into within the scope of the permission granted, although he could, presumably, require any such existing contract to be determined as soon as legitimately possible. In working out the rights, much may depend on the usual practice in regard to such lettings and on the actual terms of any contract with the Borough Billposting Co. It would, however, appear that in any case the tenant could not possibly require the landlord to account in respect of the period prior to the date of the lease Aug. 11, 1949, and (as I think at present) prior to the date of his challenge of the landlord's rights in January, 1950.

F The fortunes of war have favoured the tenant, and I venture to express the hope that he will prefer the claims of neighbourliness and reasonableness to the costs and hazards of further litigation, as he must also remember his covenant against user of the premises otherwise than as a hairdressing saloon. The hope is, perhaps, the less futile since in any further litigation he will, I gather, claim the privilege of suing at public expense.

G JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The facts have been fully stated by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., and I will, therefore, confine myself to a brief recapitulation of their essential features. The landlord is head-lessee of the whole of the premises, H No. 405, Footscray Road, New Eltham. He occupies the ground floor, where he carries on business as a butcher and provision merchant. The tenant holds the two upper floors of the premises under a lease from the landlord dated Aug. 11, 1949, for the period of twenty-one years from Mar. 25, 1949 (determinable by the tenant at the seventh or fourteenth year) at the weekly rent of £2. Prior to the grant of this lease the two upper floors had, since 1939, been occupied by the tenant at a yearly rent of £65 under a tenancy agreement with the landlord dated Feb. 10, 1939, originally for three years from Mar. 6, 1939, renewable at the tenant's option for a further period of three years, but in fact continued on a yearly basis down to the granting of the lease of Aug. 11, 1949. The tenant is a hairdresser by trade and uses the two upper floors for the purposes of a ladies' hairdressing establishment. The tenant's covenants in the lease of Aug. 11, 1949, include covenants to paint and repair the interior of the demised premises, not to make any alteration or addition in or to such premises without licence, and not (save with consent not to be unreasonably withheld) to use the demised premises for any purpose other than as a hairdressing saloon. It is not disputed that the lease of Aug. 11, 1949, and the tenancy agreement which preceded it, both included the exterior surfaces of the outside walls of the two upper floors, and that neither document contained any provision reserving to the landlord any rights over such exterior surfaces, except in so far as there must be implied under the lease such rights of access, and so forth, as may be necessary to enable the landlord to comply with a covenant on his part in the lease to perform the lessee's covenants contained in the head lease, which, presumably, include full repairing covenants.

There are, and have at all times since a date prior to the commencement of the tenant's original tenancy been, the following advertisements painted on or affixed to the exterior surfaces of the outside walls of the two upper floors demised to the tenant, viz.: (i) Painted directly on the brickwork of the wall over the door into the landlord's shop in black letters on a white ground an advertisement of the landlord's own business in these terms: "Webb's for meat grocery & provisions. Phone ELT. 2047." (ii) Displayed on a billboard affixed to the upper part of one of the flank walls of the premises a poster advertising Brymay safety matches. This poster surmounts another similarly affixed to the lower part of the same wall advertising Oxydol, the upper poster apparently extending downwards to approximately the level of the first floor, although it is impossible to say exactly where its lower edge is placed in relation to the interior division between the ground and first floors. The tenant never raised any objection to the presence on the exterior of the outer walls comprised in his tenancy or lease of the advertisement and poster I have mentioned until January, 1950, when through his solicitors he opened a correspondence on the subject of the Brymay poster. Bryant & May, Ltd., who were first approached, referred the tenant's solicitors to the Borough Billposting Co., to whom they paid rent for the display of the poster, and reference to that company (with a demand for payment to the tenant of all further rent in respect of the Brymay poster) elicited information to the effect that they held a licence from the landlord under which they used the part of the wall occupied by the poster as an advertising site. The tenant's solicitors next wrote to the landlord's solicitors claiming that the landlord should account to the tenant for all sums received by him since Mar. 6, 1939, from the Borough Billposting Co. in respect of the Brymay poster, and also asking what payment the landlord was prepared to offer for his own advertisement. After further correspondence (including a letter dated Mar. 15, 1950, whereby the tenant's solicitors gave notice terminating "all licences if any" from the tenant to the landlord in respect of the display of advertisements on the outer walls of the two floors demised to the tenant) the present proceedings ensued.

As my Lord has already stated, the proceedings took the form of an application by the tenant by originating summons for the determination of the question whether, on the true construction of the lease of Aug. 11, 1949, and in the events which had happened, the landlord was entitled, until the determination of the lease, to use for the purposes of advertising the outer walls, and, if so, what portion or portions of the outer walls, of the property demised by the lease without the tenant's consent. I would say nothing to discourage the use of the relatively cheap and expeditious procedure by originating summons for the construction of a written instrument where the real issue between the parties is one of construction, but in the present case there is, in truth, no question of construction at all. The lease of Aug. 11, 1949, contains no vestige of a provision reserving to the landlord any right to use any part of the outer walls of the demised premises for advertising purposes, and the real issue between the parties was whether the circumstances in which the lease was granted were such that some reservation of this character ought to be implied in favour of the landlord notwithstanding the total absence of any such provision from the expressed terms of the lease.

A An originating summons heard without oral evidence is not, in my view, a satisfactory form of procedure for the trial of an issue such as this. The result in the present case has been that the only evidence before the court consists of affidavits by the tenant and the landlord on which there was no cross-examination and which leave the matter to be determined simply by applying the relevant law to the bare facts above summarised.

B The matter, therefore, stands thus. The landlord did not include in the provisions of the lease, as executed, any reservation of advertising rights over any part of the outer walls. At the date of the lease the advertisements now in dispute were in their present positions on the walls and plainly to be seen. Moreover, they had existed in their present positions continuously since before the commencement of the tenant's original tenancy in 1939, and the tenant never objected to their presence at any time during his original tenancy or at the time of the granting of the lease of Aug. 11, 1949, or thereafter until January, 1950. There is no evidence that either party ever even mentioned the subject of the advertisements to the other during the whole of this period of more than ten years. This being in substance the whole of the available facts, the question is whether on those bare facts, without more, the court can and ought as a matter of law to imply in favour of the landlord a reservation during the term of twenty-one years granted by the lease of Aug. 11, 1949, of advertising rights over the outer walls demised, at all events, to the extent required to enable him to maintain the existing advertisements and to retain for his own benefit any periodical payments receivable from the Borough Billposting Co. in respect of the site of the Brymay poster.

E As to the law applicable to the case, it is not disputed that as a general rule a grantor, whether by way of conveyance or lease, or part of a hereditament in his ownership, cannot claim any easement over the part granted for the benefit of the part retained unless it is expressly reserved out of the grant: see, e.g., Suffield v. Brown (4), Crossley & Sons, Ltd. v. Lightowler (11) and Wheeldon v. Burrows (10). There are, however, certain exceptions to the general rule.

F Two well-established exceptions relate to easements of necessity and mutual easements such as rights of support between adjacent buildings. It is, however, recognised in the authorities that these two specific exceptions do not exhaust the list, which is, indeed, incapable of exhaustive statement as the circumstances of any particular case may be such as to raise a necessary inference that the common intention of the parties must have been to reserve some easement to the grantor or such as to preclude the grantee from denying the right consistently with good faith, and there appears to be no doubt that where circumstances such as these are clearly established the court will imply the appropriate reservation. For statements of the general rule and observations on the types of case which should be treated as exceptions to it, reference may usefully be made to the following authorities.

G H In Wheeldon v. Burrows (10) THESIGER, L.J. (12 Ch.D. 49), states two propositions as "the general rules governing cases of this kind." The first concerns easements passing to the grantee and is not relevant here. The second he states (ibid.) as being

"... that, if the grantor intends to reserve any right over the tenement granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant. Those are the general rules governing cases of this kind, but the second of those rules is subject to certain exceptions. One of those exceptions is the well-known exception which attaches to cases of what are called ways of necessity; and I do not dispute for a moment that there may be, and probably are, certain other exceptions, to which I shall refer before I close my observations upon this case. Both of the general rules which I have mentioned are founded upon a maxim which is as well established by authority as it is consonant to reason and common sense, viz., that a grantor shall not derogate from his grant."

The learned lord justice deals further with the question of exceptions (ibid., 59), but, apart from the case of easements of necessity, he does not appear to have been disposed to admit any further exceptions other than cases of mutual easements and cases in which the same vendor sells by auction different lots to different persons at the same time, where the purchaser of one lot may be entitled to an easement over another lot even though the latter was in fact actually conveyed before the former: see Swansborough v. Coventry (13). In Russell v. Watts (6) the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., after referring to the general rule that a man cannot be prevented from darkening his neighbour's windows by a lawful act done on his own land unless light has been enjoyed through those windows for twenty years and also to the second of the two propositions in Wheeldon v. Burrows (10), said (10 App. Cas. 596):

"It is manifest, however, that neither of those rules can be invoked in defence of any act contrary to the good faith of a particular contract."

In Aldridge v. Wright (5) SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1929] 2 K.B. 124):

"There are exceptions to the doctrine of Wheeldon v. Burrows (10). I do not see my way to attempt an exhaustive statement of those exceptions, as facts would immediately present themselves to prove my absence of foresight, and I find some of the suggested exceptions difficult to understand—but I do not find any suggested exception which covers the facts of this case," and, after citing (ibid., 125) the well-known statement of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Puillback Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Woodman (1) ([1915] A.C. 646) (to which I will return), he stated his conclusions thus ([1929] 2 K.B. 127):

"I think the grantee of No. 30, when his grantor claims to have impliedly reserved such a right from his grant, though it is not mentioned in his grant, is entitled to require the clearest evidence of an 'intention of the parties' that there should be reserved for the benefit of No. 28 an easement or quasi-easement to be used and enjoyed as of right. In my opinion the defendant has failed to show such a common intention or implied reservation in this case; the doctrine of Wheeldon v. Burrows (10) applies; the decision of the Divisional Court must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed."

GREER, L.J. (ibid., 129) quoted the general rule as enunciated by THESIGER, L.J., in Wheeldon v. Burrows (10) and stated five classes of exceptions which he thought to be the only ones warranted by the authorities and of which it is only necessary to mention the third, which is thus stated (ibid., 130):

"3. If the owner of two adjoining properties. A and B, grants to the tenant of A a tenancy from year to year with a right of way during his tenancy over B, and subsequently leases B, the lease of B is subject to a reservation of the right of way which has ex hypothesi been granted to the tenant of A if it is shown that the lessee of B was aware of a long-continued exercise of the right by the tenant of A: Thomas v. Owen (14)."

SANKEY, L.J., said (ibid., 134):

"I do not think it is possible, at any rate I propose to resist the dangerous ambition of trying, to lay down a rule which will cover all exceptions. It is impossible to foresee facts; all that can be said is that the onus is upon the grantor to establish the facts to prove that his case is an exception to the rule. In Wheeldon v. Burrows (10) he failed to do so."

In Liddiard v. Waldron (15), Thomas v. Owen (14) was distinguished and GREER, L.J., after referring to Aldridge v. Wright (5) and the rule in Wheeldon v. Burrows (10) said ([1934] 1 K.B. 447):

A "The courts have been faced with the question whether or not in some cases there are exceptional circumstances which justify departure from that rule. One of those exceptional cases was established in Thomas v. Owen (14), the effect of which I ventured to summarise in these words . . ."

GREER, L.J., then set out and re-affirmed his statement of the effect of that case in Aldridge v. Wright (5) and added (ibid.):

B " Thomas v. Owen (14) is only an illustration of the proposition that a man cannot grant to A what he has already given to B, and, therefore, in order to give effect to what he has already given to B, if the grantee knows the facts, there must be an implied reservation of that which would enable him to perform his obligation to his tenant under his existing lease."

C The most comprehensive statement of the area of potential exceptions is probably that contained in the speech of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Pwllbach Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Woodman (1), where his Lordship, after referring to the exception with respect to easements of necessity, said this ([1915] A.C. 646):

D " "The second class of cases in which easements may impliedly be created depends not upon the terms of the grant itself, but upon the circumstances under which the grant was made. The law will readily imply the grant or reservation of such easements as may be necessary to give effect to the common intention of the parties to a grant of real property, with reference to the manner or purposes in and for which the land granted or some land retained by the grantor is to be used: see Jones v. Pritchard (2) and Lyttelton Times Co., Ltd. v. Warners, Ltd. (3). But it is essential for this purpose that the parties should intend that the subject of the grant or the land retained by the grantor should be used in some definite and particular manner. It is not enough that the subject of the grant or the land retained should be intended to be used in a manner which may or may not involve this definite and particular use."

E The illustrations given by LORD PARKER in support of this general proposition seem, however, to show that it is of less comprehensive import than would at first sight appear. He refers to Jones v. Pritchard (2), which was, in effect, a case of mutual easements; to Lyttelton Times Co., Ltd. v. Warners, Ltd. (3), where both parties contemplated at the time of the grant that the grantor should carry on his printing works on the part of the premises retained and it was held that the grantee could not in those circumstances complain of a nuisance to the premises granted due to noise and vibration unavoidably occasioned by the carrying on as contemplated of printing operations on the grantor's part of the premises; and to two other cases which appear to have proceeded on similar principles.

G The case which in point of actual decision goes furthest in the direction of implying reservations of easements in favour of a grantor is, undoubtedly, Simpson v. Weber (12). The question there was whether the grantor of one of two adjoining houses owned by him had by implication reserved the right to have a creeper growing in the garden of the house retained supported by a wall of the house granted over which its foliage had spread, and the right to continue the attachment of a gate forming part of the premises retained to a wall forming part of the premises granted, and the Divisional Court, reversing a county court judge, decided in favour of the grantor's successor in title on both points. Of this case I need only say that while the physical circumstances at the date of the severance may, perhaps, have sufficed to support an implication of an intention common to grantor and grantee that the easements in question should be reserved, I cannot agree that the decision is good law so far as it proceeds on the ground, given in both the two not very satisfactory reports, that (133 L.T. 47; 41 T.L.R. 304),

"there was no evidence that it was not the intention of the parties that the creeper and gate-post should stay."

In his judgment in the present case DANCKWERTS, J., after citing at length from Simpson v. Weber (12), and also referring to Liddiard v. Waldron (15), A Wheeldon v. Burrows (10) and Thomas v. Owen (14), expressed his conclusion thus ([1950] 2 All E.R. 831):

"It does seem to me that there may be exceptional circumstances in which it is only common sense to imply some reservation, and that such an implication should be made in the circumstances of the present case. When I see from the photograph which is before me that when the parties entered into their transaction there was an enormous advertisement painted on the wall advertising Webb's for meat, grocery and provisions, and a very large advertisement advertising Brymay safety matches, which had been there at least since 1939, and when no evidence is given that anything was said by either of the parties about the removal of those advertisements, it appears to me to be common sense to imply an intention on the part of the parties that they should remain. Therefore, I am prepared to hold that there was in favour of the landlord implied in this lease an easement until the termination of the lease to keep those two advertisements in the position in which they were, and, by necessary implication, a right to repair them, paint them, and do whatever may be necessary from time to time to preserve them as effective advertisements."

I find myself unable to agree with the learned judge's conclusion. The question is whether the circumstances of the present case as proved in evidence are such as to raise a necessary inference that the common intention of the parties was to reserve to the landlord during the twenty-one years' term some, and, if so, what, rights in regard to the display of advertisements over the outer walls of the demised premises, or such as to preclude the tenant from denying the implied reservation to the landlord of some such rights consistently with good faith.

That question must be approached with the following principles in mind: (i) If the landlord intended to reserve any such rights over the demised premises it was his duty to reserve them expressly in the lease of Aug. 11, 1949: Wheeldon v. Burrows (10). (ii) The landlord having failed in this duty, the onus was on him to establish the facts to prove, and prove clearly, that his case was an exception to the rule: Aldridge v. Wright (5). (iii) The mere fact that the tenant knew at the date of the lease of Aug. 11, 1949, that the landlord was using the outer walls of the demised premises for the display of the advertisements in question did not suffice to absolve the landlord from his duty of expressly reserving any rights in respect of them he intended to claim, or to take the case out of the general rule: see Suffield v. Brown (4) (4 De G.J. & Sm. 199), Crossley & Sons, Ltd. v. Lightowler (11) (2 Ch. App. 486).

Applying these principles to the present case, I ask myself whether on the meagre facts proved the landlord has discharged the onus which lies on him of proving it an exception to the general rule. He can, so far as I can see, derive no assistance from the passage quoted from the speech of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in the Pullback Colliery case (1). It might, I suppose, be said to have been in the contemplation of the parties that the landlord would continue to use the ground floor of the premises for the purposes of his business as a butcher and provision merchant, but it cannot, in my view, be contended that the maintenance during the term of the lease of his advertisement over the door was a necessary incident of the user so contemplated. This applies a fortiori to the Brymay advertisement, the display of which on the outer wall of the demised

A premises by the Borough Billposting Co. as licensees of the landlord was, so far as I can see, not related in any way to the use or occupation of the ground floor for the existing or any other purpose. The transaction with that company was simply a hiring out for reward of part of an outer wall of the demised premises for use as an advertising or billposting site or station. The mere fact that the tenant knew of the presence of the advertisements at the date when the lease of Aug. 11, 1949, was granted being beside the point, nothing is left beyond the bare circumstance that the advertisements were not only present at the date of the grant, but had been continuously present without objection by the tenant since the commencement of his original tenancy in 1939. Does this circumstance suffice to raise a necessary inference of an intention common to both parties at the date of the lease that the landlord should have reserved to him the right to maintain these advertisements throughout the twenty-one years' term thereby granted? I cannot see that it does. The most that can be said is that the facts are consistent with such a common intention. That will not do. The landlord must surely show at least that the facts are not reasonably consistent with any other explanation. Here he manifestly fails. It may be that neither party ever applied his mind at all to the question whether the outer walls were included in, or excluded from, the original tenancy or the lease ultimately granted, or what their respective rights as to the use of such walls for any purpose might be. It may be that the tenant, so far as he applied his mind to the matter at all, merely refrained from objecting to the presence of the advertisements because, whether the landlord was within his rights in maintaining them or not, he, the tenant, did not for the time being think it worth his while to object. As to the landlord, he may have been under the erroneous impression that, notwithstanding the tenancy and, subsequently, notwithstanding the lease, he was entitled to use the outer walls for advertising purposes. If so, his own mistake will not avail him, at all events in the absence of evidence that the tenant was aware of it. On the other hand, the landlord may have thought, when he came to grant the lease, that, as the tenant had never objected to the advertisements during all the ten years of his previous tenancy, it could be assumed that the tenant would not object in the future, and have preferred, accordingly, to let the matter rest at that rather than raise the question by claiming a reservation. In short, I can hold nothing more established by the facts proved than permissive user of the outer walls by the landlord for the display of the advertisements during the original tenancy and thereafter from the granting of the lease until the tenant's objection in January, 1950, with nothing approaching grounds for inferring, as a matter of necessary inference, an intention common to both parties that such permissive user should be converted by the lease into a reservation to the landlord of equivalent rights throughout the twenty-one years' term thereby granted. If the hypothetical officious stranger, sometimes used as a test of implied terms, had intervened in the course of the negotiation of the lease and had said: "What about Mr. Webb's advertisements?" would both parties have exclaimed with one voice: "Of course they are to stay"? I see no justification for this assumption. The landlord might well have said: "Of course I want them to stay," but, as likely as not, the tenant would have said: "At present I have no objection to the advertisements, but I cannot bind myself to allow them for twenty-one years. For all I know, I may at any time during that period for one reason or another want them removed. If the landlord insists on reserving rights in the matter, he must reduce the rent or find some other tenant." So far as the Brymay advertisement is concerned, the present case resembles Thomas v. Owen (14) in that the right in question was granted by the landlord to the Borough Billposting Co. before the date of the lease. This means only that prima facie the demise to the tenant took effect subject to the company's right, and cannot, so far as I can see, afford any ground for implying a reservation by the landlord to himself of the proceeds accruing subsequently to the date of the lease from thus hiring out a part of the demised premises or any right to grant any further licence for a similar purpose.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and that a negative answer should be returned to the question raised by the summons. The consequences of a decision to that effect are not strictly before us, but I should, perhaps, add (with a view so far as possible to curtailing the grounds for future controversy): (i) That, so far as the painted advertisement is concerned, the surface on which it appears, including the painted lettering and background themselves, in my view, passed under the demise, so that the mere continued presence of the painted background and lettering in their existing state cannot constitute a trespass. Re-painting would, however, be a different matter, and there is nothing to prevent the tenant using the same surface for any purpose not involving a breach of any of the covenants on his part contained in the lease notwithstanding that the effect of so doing may be to obscure the landlord's advertisement. (ii) Although there is no reservation to the landlord of any rights over the relevant area of wall in respect of the Brymay advertisement, the lease must, as I have said, prima facie have taken effect subject to the rights (whatever they may be) of the Borough Billposting Co. under the licence granted to them by the landlord, and, as between the tenant and the landlord, have passed to the tenant the benefit of the company's obligations under that licence so far as it affects the outer wall of the demised premises. It is obvious that, if the parties choose to litigate further, there may be ample room for controversy as to the apportionment of any rent paid by the company in respect of the two posters (the Brymay one being substantially, but perhaps not wholly, on the demised part of the outer wall and the Oxydol one being substantially, but perhaps not wholly, on the retained part of the outer wall), and as to the date from which the tenant can claim the benefit of any contract with the company or call on the landlord to account for his receipts under it, having regard to the fact that the tenant, as between himself and the landlord, must, I think, clearly be taken to have given his tacit consent to the presence of the Brymay poster down to January, 1950. It is to be hoped that common sense (to which DANCKWERTS, J., appealed in his judgment) will lead to a reasonable settlement of these outstanding matters.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. The landlord and the tenant expressed the terms of their agreement in a lease which appears to be both full and formal. The landlord becomes confronted, therefore, with one of the general rules referred to by THESIGER, L.J., in Wheeldon v. Burrows (10) (12 Ch.D. 49), i.e., that, if a grantor intends to reserve any right over the tenement granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant. That rule is but one application of the maxim that a grantor shall not derogate from his grant, a maxim which THESIGER, L.J., refers to (ibid.) as being as well established by authority as it is consonant to reason and common sense. The general rule is, however, subject to certain exceptions, and these are discussed by THESIGER, L.J., in Wheeldon v. Burrows (10). One of the most familiar examples of an exception is that which attaches to cases of what are called ways of necessity. Instances of other exceptions were recited by GREER, L.J., in his judgment in Aldridge v. Wright (5) ([1929] 2 K.B. 130).

In my judgment, the issue in the present case may be stated in the form of the question which SANKEY, L.J., posed in Aldridge v. Wright (5) (ibid., 137), i.e.: "Has the defendant proved that the case is an exception to the general rule?" In my judgment, the landlord has not shown that he comes within any exception which is embraced by the principles laid down in the authorities. In his speech in Pullbach Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Woodman (1) LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON said ([1915] A.C. 646) that, apart from implied grants by way of necessity or of what are called continuous and apparent easements, the cases in which easements can be granted by implication could be classified under two heads. LORD PARKER stated the first of these as being where the implication arises because the right in question is necessary for the enjoyment of some other right expressly granted. He stated the second in the following words (ibid.):

A "The second class of cases in which easements may impliedly be created depends not upon the terms of the grant itself, but upon the circumstances under which the grant was made. The law will readily imply the grant or reservation of such easements as may be necessary to give effect to the common intention of the parties to a grant of real property, with reference to the manner or purposes in and for which the land granted or some land retained by the grantor is to be used: see Jones v. Pritchard (2) and Lyttelton Times Co., Ltd. v. Warners, Ltd. (3). But it is essential for this purpose that the parties should intend that the subject of the grant or the land retained by the grantor should be used in some definite and particular manner. It is not enough that the subject of the grant or the land retained should be intended to be used in a manner which may or may not involve this definite and particular use."

B If these words are referred to as applying a test to the situation, the landlord would, in my judgment, fail to show on the facts of the present case that some reservation of a right ought to be implied. The implication of a reservation would have to be conclusively indicated and it would not suffice if the matter remained in the sphere of conjecture or ambiguity. The facts in the present case are not inconsistent with, and do not effectively negative, the view that the tenant may not have given thought to the question of having advertisements on the wall demised to him continuously during the period of the lease. Further, it may be D that the tenant lacked advice on legal matters. Neither is it shown, in my judgment, that any reflection on his good faith can validly be alleged, nor that he remained silent at a time when he should have been assertive. Further, it cannot be demonstrated that he has done anything to jeopardise his right to withdraw any permission previously tacitly given. On the particular and somewhat meagre facts which are before the court it is not, in my judgment, shown that it must E have been the common intention that the landlord was to reserve a right to retain advertisements on the wall demised. As that is not shown, the question propounded in the summons should, in my judgment, be answered in the negative. I would also add that I am in agreement with the observations made by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in regard to any further assessment or adjustment of the position as between the tenant and the landlord.

BURTON AND ANOTHER v. HOLDSWORTH.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Streatfeild, J.), May 4, 11, 1951.]

Legal Aid—Remittance of action in tort to county court unless security given by plaintiff for defendant's costs—Legal aid certificate issued to plaintiff—Jurisdiction to remit action—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 46 (2).

In an action for damages for negligence the defendant applied to the court, under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 46 (1), to transfer the action to the county court in default of the plaintiffs giving security for his costs. His application was supported by an affidavit showing that the plaintiffs had no visible means of paying his costs should they be unsuccessful. The plaintiffs contended that the court had no jurisdiction to transfer the action under s. 46 (1) of the Act of 1934, as one of the plaintiffs had been granted a legal aid certificate under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.

HELD: the Act of 1949 contained no express provision affecting the discretion of the court to make an order under s. 46 (2) of the Act of 1934, and the regulations envisaged by s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) of the Act of 1949 could not affect a defendant's statutory right to a transfer of the action to a county court, as distinct from his right to security for costs, and, therefore, the exercise of the discretion of the court under s. 46 (2) of the Act of 1934 was not precluded by the fact that a legal aid certificate had been issued to one of the plaintiffs, but was to be exercised in accordance with the principles followed under the Poor Persons Rules before the Act of 1949 came into force.

APPEAL by the defendant in an action for damages for negligence from a decision of Master LAWRENCE, dated Apr. 16, 1951, whereby the learned master refused to make an order that, unless the plaintiffs gave security for the defendant's costs, the action should be transferred to the Ilford County Court, under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 46. The learned master held that, as one of the plaintiffs had received a legal aid certificate under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, he was precluded by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. ([1951] 1 All E.R. 56) from making an order under s. 46 of the Act of 1934. The appeal from his decision was heard by STREATFEILD, J., in chambers and was adjourned into court for judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11. STREATFEILD, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal by the defendant from the refusal of Master LAWRENCE on Apr. 16, 1951, to order that, unless the plaintiffs give security for the defendant's costs, this action be transferred to the Ilford County Court under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 46. The case raises the question whether the powers of the High Court or a judge thereof under s. 46 of the County Courts Act, 1934, are affected by the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and, having heard the arguments of counsel for the parties in chambers on May 4, I have at their request adjourned the case into court for the purpose of giving this judgment, so that, should either party desire to appeal further, there may be a shorthand transcript of the judgment available.

The material facts are as follows. On Aug. 17, 1950, a collision occurred between a motor cycle ridden by the plaintiff, William Burton, with the plaintiff, Leslie Burton, as pillion passenger, and the defendant's motor van. Both plaintiffs were injured, William the more seriously. He sustained a fracture of each bone of the left lower leg, involving part of the ankle joint, and it is said that there may be some permanent partial disability owing to the possibility of arthritis setting in. He claims £153 special damages. Leslie sustained cuts, bruises and shock, and he claims £19 10s. special damages. On Oct. 30, 1950, a writ was issued, and on Dec. 7 a statement of claim was delivered, claiming damages for the alleged negligence of the defendant's driver. Both plaintiffs were then ordinary, self-supporting litigants.

On Dec. 11, 1950, the defendant applied to the High Court under s. 46 (1) of the County Courts Act, 1934, to transfer the action to the county court in default of the plaintiffs giving security for his costs. In due course the application came before Master BAKER, supported by an affidavit by Mr. Arthur Gregory, an inquiry agent, and Mr. Rex Wyeth, the defendant's solicitor, sworn respectively on Dec. 18 and 15, 1950, in the following terms. First, Mr. Gregory states that, having received instructions from the defendant's solicitors, he made inquiries as to the financial position of the two plaintiffs. Both plaintiffs are single men residing with their parents at 9, Chisenhale Road, Bethnal Green, E.2, and this address is situated in a working-class district. They pay £2 10s. per week each for board and lodging. The plaintiff, William, is an attendant at the electricity sub-station, Poplar, earning £7 10s. per week, and has no other means. The plaintiff,

Leslie, is employed as an electrician's mate by J. Lyons & Co., Ltd., of Cadby Hall, Kensington, earning £6 per week, and he also has no other means. The information contained in the first paragraph of the affidavit, which Mr. Gregory believes to be true, was, as to the premises being situated in a working-class district, derived from his own observation, and, as to the remainder, was obtained by him from the plaintiffs' mother in answer to his inquiries, and, having regard to those matters, he submits that the plaintiffs have no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant should a verdict not be found for the plaintiffs in this action. Mr. Wyeth, a solicitor, for himself deposes that he is acting as solicitor in this matter and that the facts and matters out of which the proceedings have arisen are known to him, and, in his opinion, the defendant has a good defence to the action on the merits. After reading that evidence, Master BAKER was informed that the plaintiff, William, was seeking legal aid under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and thereupon he adjourned the application for further consideration after that plaintiff had become an "assisted person." On Feb. 19, 1951, William was granted a legal aid certificate, and the defendant's solicitor was notified thereof on Mar. 14. On Apr. 4, 1951, the summons under s. 46 of the Act of 1934 was restored. On Apr. 14, 1951, the defendant delivered his defence, denying negligence and pleading that the accident was caused solely, or contributed to, by the negligence of the plaintiff, William Burton. On Apr. 16, 1951, the application came before Master LAWRENCE, who refused to transfer the action on the ground that, having regard to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1), the jurisdiction to transfer an action under s. 46 (2) of the County Courts Act, 1934, is not exercisable after a legal aid certificate has been issued under the Act of 1949. Hence this appeal to the judge in chambers.

Counsel for the defendant submits, and counsel for the plaintiffs concedes, that Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) deals with a matter quite different from s. 46 of the Act of 1934 and does not conclude this case. I agree with them, but, since I am told that the learned master felt himself precluded by that decision from exercising his jurisdiction under s. 46 (2), I think that I should indicate why, in my view, that decision does not apply to this case. Section 46 of the Act of 1934 gives a defendant, in an action of tort in the High Court brought against him by a plaintiff who has no visible means of paying the defendant's costs if unsuccessful, a statutory right, not to an order for security for his costs, but to ask the court, if having regard to all the circumstances it thinks fit to do so, to transfer the action to the county court, unless the plaintiff does give security for the defendant's costs. This is a statutory protection to be given to a defendant in the court's discretion in a proper case, so that a successful defendant's costs, which he may be unable to recover from an impecunious plaintiff, may at least be minimised. It is open to the plaintiff to avoid the transfer by giving security for costs, if he can, but he is not ordered to do so, and in any case he is not barred from pursuing his legal remedy. He is still free to continue his action, though, in default of security for costs, in a court where lesser costs are incurred. By contrast, under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15, an appellant to the Court of Appeal may, in special circumstances, e.g., poverty or insolvency, be ordered to give security for the respondent's costs, and the proceedings may be stayed pending security being given, and in default of security the appeal may stand dismissed. This is a rule of procedure in the Court of Appeal, and it was well settled that, where a poor person's certificate was granted under the old procedure (now superseded by the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949), the Court of Appeal would make no order for security for costs, and an order already made would lapse: see Willé v. St. John (2). Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) was a case of the latter variety. The plaintiff, who at the time was an ordinary litigant, was ordered to give security for costs of his appeal to the Court of Appeal. He was then granted an emergency certificate under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. The Court of Appeal held that, pending the making of regulations under s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) (which contemplates that in certain circumstances security for costs will be ordered), and in the absence of special circumstances, it was inappropriate that an order for security for costs against an assisted person should stand, thus following the old procedure. Conway's case (1), as it seems to me, is an authority on procedure only, and does not govern the case of a statutory right to the transfer of an action to the county court in default of security for costs, as distinct from a right to such security by itself, which, as I have stated, s. 46 of the Act of 1934 does not confer. I am, therefore, of opinion, with respect to the learned master, that his decision in the present case was based on an erroneous interpretation of Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1).

Apart from submitting that Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) is inapplicable, the argument of counsel for the defendant may be stated under two main heads. He contends (i) that, under the old Poor Persons Rules (R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 22 to r. 31H), the fact that a plaintiff was suing in forma pauperis did not preclude the exercise of the court's discretion under s. 46 of the Act of 1934 (or its predecessor, s. 2 of the County Courts Act, 1919) and, incidentally, that, if it could be equitably exercised under the old procedure, it can be even more equitably done now that an assisted person enjoys greater privileges under the Act of 1949; (ii) that the Act of 1949 and the regulations made thereunder contain, and hereafter can contain, nothing to invade a defendant's rights under s. 46 of the Act of 1934. For his first submission, counsel for the defendant relies on Cook v. Imperial Tobacco Co. (3), a case under s. 2 of the County Courts Act, 1919, which was in similar terms to those of s. 46 of the Act of 1934. It is only necessary to read the headnote, which is as follows:

A "A county court judge has no jurisdiction to admit a plaintiff to sue as a poor person in the county court. Where a plaintiff has been admitted to take proceedings in tort in the High Court as a poor person under Ord. 16, r. 22 to r. 31, a master or judge may nevertheless properly exercise his discretion under s. 2 of the County Courts Act, 1919, in remitting the action for trial in the county court, notwithstanding that the effect of such remittal, in cases in which the plaintiff has no means at all, will, owing to the absence of authority to admit him to sue in the county court as a poor person, be to deprive him of all power to continue the prosecution of the action. The master or judge however when exercising the discretion to remit ought to take that fact into consideration."

B That, indeed, is a strong authority, and it is to be emphasised that the court exercised the jurisdiction to transfer the action to the county court notwithstanding that under the rules in force at that time the plaintiff could not be admitted to sue in the county court as a poor person, thereby, in effect, depriving her of power to continue the action. Counsel for the defendant points out that that defect has now been remedied in a plaintiff's favour. For, although the Act of 1949 does not yet apply to actions initiated in the county court, as it eventually will, the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (Commencement) Order, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1357), art. 1, has already brought into force, as from Oct. 2, 1950, the material provisions of the Act, whereby a person may be granted legal aid, not only in proceedings in the Supreme Court, but also in

C "... proceedings in any county court ... in or in connection with any action ... remitted or transferred thereto from the Supreme Court ..."

D This must include actions transferred to the county court under s. 46 of the Act of 1934. Thus, a plaintiff is no longer prejudiced by such a transfer, but can clearly continue his action as an assisted person in the county court. Counsel for the defendant, therefore, submits that this case should be regarded as a fortiori Cook v. Imperial Tobacco Co. (3).

E As to his second submission, he submits that in any case the statutory power of the Lord Chancellor to make regulations under s. 12 (2) (b) of the Act of 1949 is limited to regulating

"... the procedure of any court ... in relation to legal aid, and in particular [making] provision ... (ii) as to the cases in which and extent to which a person receiving legal aid may be required to give security for costs ..."

F —e.g., cases under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 6 and r. 6A. He submits that the Lord Chancellor would have no power to make such regulations as would deprive a defendant of his statutory right to the transfer of an action in the court's discretion under s. 46 of the Act of 1934, particularly having regard to s. 1 (7) (b) of the Act of 1949 whereby, save as expressly provided by Part I of the Act or regulations made thereunder,

G "... the rights conferred ... on a person receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or liabilities of other parties to the proceedings ..."

H The "liabilities" of other parties were dealt with by HILBERY, J., in Daley v. Diggers, Ltd. (4). This is the converse case of their "rights," which must be governed by the same principle. The Act itself contains no express provision affecting s. 46 of the Act of 1934, nor could the regulations envisaged by s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) affect a defendant's statutory right to a transfer of the action to a county court, as distinct from a right to security for costs.

In answer to this formidable argument, counsel for the plaintiffs puts forward a somewhat ingenious reply. First, he submits that, although nothing in the Act of 1949 supersedes s. 46 of the Act of 1934, yet the Act of 1949 and its regulations make it impossible in practice to carry out that section. Secondly, with regard to Cook v. Imperial Tobacco Co. (3), he submits that the principle on which an assisted person may now be ordered to pay costs is different from that under the old Poor Persons Rules (R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 22 to r. 31H), and that no case decided under those rules is now relevant. As to his first submission, his argument is as follows. Under s. 46 (1) of the Act of 1934, the governing requirement is that the plaintiff the important words being “the costs of the defendant.” By s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949 an assisted person’s liability to pay costs is limited, and “shall not exceed the amount (if any) which is a reasonable one for him to pay,” and the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 17, lays down the principles which must guide the court in assessing his liability, and gives power to direct payment by instalments or to defer payment until a particular date, or to vary an order for costs on the ground of a change in his circumstances at any time within six years after the order. He thus becomes liable to pay only what, when and how the court thinks he can reasonably pay, and so, argues counsel for the plaintiffs, those restricted costs which he becomes liable to pay become “the costs of the defendant” within the meaning of s. 46 (1) of the Act of 1934. Therefore, says counsel, there cannot now in practice be a situation where the plaintiff has no visible means of paying the defendant’s costs under s. 46 of the Act of 1934, because either the plaintiff has some means, or, if he has none, he is not liable to pay any costs, and, therefore, there are no “costs of the defendant” within s. 46 (1).

I am quite unable to accept this argument. In my opinion, the words of s. 46 (1), enacted in 1934 before the Act of 1949 was thought of, must be given their natural meaning. The “costs of the defendant” clearly mean “the costs incurred by the defendant,” no doubt as allowed on taxation, and they are no less “the costs of the defendant” because a subsequent Act may have limited the unsuccessful plaintiff’s liability to pay them. I cannot interpret the words in s. 46 (1) as being the equivalent of “such of the defendant’s costs as the court may order the plaintiff to pay.” Moreover, it is to be noted that under s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949, in determining the amount of costs which is reasonable for the assisted person to pay, the court must have regard to all the circumstances, which include, not only his own means, but the means of the other parties and the conduct of all of them. It is, therefore, not impossible, even now, for the court to order the assisted person to pay the full taxed costs of the defendant. In that event, on the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs, the “costs of the defendant” would, in fact, be his full taxed costs. In my view, however, it is clearly wrong to interpret the defendant’s right under s. 46 of the Act of 1934, which he is given during the interlocutory stages of an action, according to the determination of a matter which does not take place until the very end of the actual hearing.

The second submission of counsel for the plaintiffs is that, formerly, under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 28 (1), the court had the same unfettered discretion in the matter of costs as in an ordinary action: see Olds v. Olds, Brittan v. Brittan (5), and Huntingford v. Huntingford (6). Although a litigant was a poor person, there was always a potential liability to pay costs. Now, under the Act of 1949, the court’s discretion is fettered and regulated by s. 2 (2) (e) and reg. 17 of the regulations of 1950. Although, however, the discretion is now fettered, in my opinion it still remains a discretion, and, as I have already pointed out, it may in a proper case be so exercised as to make the assisted person liable for full taxed costs. I am unable to follow why, even if the court’s discretion is now fettered, the principle underlying Cook v. Imperial Tobacco Co. (3) is affected, as counsel for the plaintiffs submits. As I read it, the only relevance of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 21 to r. 31, in that case was that the fact that a plaintiff could not then be admitted to sue in the county court as a poor person was a matter to be considered by the master or judge in deciding whether to transfer an action to the county court under s. 2 of the County Courts Act, 1919. Now that legal aid is, under the Act of 1949, available in the case of actions transferred from the High Court to the county court, that factor has disappeared, and Cook v. Imperial Tobacco Co. (3) remains good law under the corresponding section, s. 46 of the Act of 1934, and unaffected by the fact that the court's discretion to award costs against an assisted person is now exercised on a different basis.

A In my judgment, therefore, the argument of counsel for the defendant is correct. I follow the decision in Cook v. Imperial Tobacco Co. (3) in deciding that there was nothing in the old Poor Persons Rules (R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 22 to r. 31H) to preclude the exercise of the court's discretion under s. 46 of the Act of 1934 against a person suing in forma pauperis, and there is, and can be, nothing under the Act of 1949 to alter this position save for the better for the plaintiff who can continue the action as an assisted person in the county court. In my view, the discretion of the court under s. 46 is still to be exercised according to the old principles, as follows: (i) Where there is more than one plaintiff, unless there is ground for making the order against both, it cannot be made against either: see Sykes v. Sykes (7); (ii) I must be satisfied that the plaintiffs, and each of them, have no visible means of paying the defendant's costs. That does not, of course, signify merely "tangible" means, but it does require evidence of lack of capacity to pay the defendant's costs if the plaintiffs should be unsuccessful. Here, both plaintiffs are in much the same position, although only William Burton is an assisted person. They are brothers, living with their parents in a working-class district in Bethnal Green. According to Mr. Gregory's affidavit, based on information given by the plaintiffs' mother, William earns £7 10s. a week and Leslie £6 a week. Neither has any other means, and each pays his mother £2 10s. a week for his maintenance. That leaves Leslie with £3 10s. a week and William £5 a week for all other purposes, but I am informed that William has to pay £1 10s. a week towards his maximum contribution of £70 10s. as an assisted person. Thus, in effect, he, too, is left with £3 10s. a week. William's disposable income is for purposes of the Act of 1949 given as £297 a year, and disposable capital nil. In my view, in these days a plaintiff who, after paying his board and lodging, is left with only £3 10s. a week out of his wages for all other purposes cannot be said to have "visible means of paying" the defendant's costs of an action in the High Court if he (the plaintiff) should prove unsuccessful. In my judgment, therefore, the first ingredient of s. 46 is satisfied as regards these plaintiffs.

F Then I must be satisfied that in all the circumstances it is a fit case for trial in the county court, which includes consideration of the nature of the injuries and the nature of the action itself. Now, although William sustained a fractured leg and there may be a question of some permanent partial incapacity, I do not consider that there is anything about his injuries—and still less about those of Leslie—to make it more appropriate to retain the case in the High Court. The issues on the pleadings appear to be free from complication and do not involve any unusual or difficult points of law, and the defendant's solicitor, Mr. Wyeth, deposes in his affidavit that in his opinion the defendant has a good defence to the action. In my judgment, therefore, this is a case where, having regard to all of the circumstances, the discretion of the court under s. 46 (2) of the County Courts Act, 1934, should be exercised in the defendant's favour, and, accordingly, this appeal will be allowed, and I make the order prayed for in the notice of appeal, providing for security for the defendant's costs in the sum of £30.

Appeal allowed.

THE ABBEY, MALVERN WELLS, LTD. v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), May 2, 1951.]

Charity—Town and country planning—Land held on charitable trusts—Use of land for charitable purposes—Land owned by company and used for school—Shares of company held by trustees under provisions of trust deed—School conducted on non-profit-making basis under deed—Payment by pupils of full fees—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 85 (1). A

A private company was incorporated in 1926 for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on a girls' school. On Nov. 23, 1933, the shares of the company, which were originally held by the founders of the school, were transferred by them to the trustees of a trust deed, executed on that date, to be held on the trusts of the deed, the object of which was "to secure that the . . . school shall henceforth be carried on under the guidance of a body of persons interested in the education of girls and with a view to promoting solely the educational work and efficiency of the school . . ." On the same day some of the company's articles were altered in certain respects. By its articles, as amended, the company was to be managed by a council consisting of the trustees of the trust deed, who were prohibited from receiving remuneration for their services, and no share qualification was necessary for a member of the council. The fees to be charged for the tuition, boarding and maintenance of pupils were to be fixed by the council, who had power to suspend any pupil whose fees had not been paid. Under its memorandum and articles the company had the power to make profits and distribute dividends, but by cl. 2 of the trust deed the shares were to be held by the trustees on trust "for the benefit of the school and all dividends and other moneys derived therefrom shall be dealt with in such manner as the trustees in their discretion shall think advisable with a view to promoting the educational work and efficiency of the school." Clause 11 of the trust deed provided that, if the school should cease to be carried on, the trusts declared by the trust deed should thereupon determine and the trustees should hold the shares and any money or property representing or derived from the shares on trust "to deal with the same in such manner for the advancement of the education of girls as the trustees in their absolute discretion shall determine." The company contended that the land owned and leased by it and used for the purposes of the school was land to which the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 85 applied, as it was land an interest in which was held on charitable trusts or for charitable purposes and which was used at all material times for or in connection with the purposes for which the interest was held, within s. 85 (1) of the Act. B C D E F

HELD: (i) as the trust deed of Nov. 23, 1933, directed the manner in which the trustees were to operate the powers which they possessed as the holders of the shares of the company, in determining whether the requirements of s. 85 (1) of the Act of 1947 were satisfied it was necessary to look, not only at the company's memorandum and articles, but also at the trust deed; the whole purpose of the trust deed was to secure the education of the girls at the school on a non-profit-making basis, and it was merely the manner in which the dividends and other moneys derived from the shares should be applied in promoting the educational work and efficiency of the school that was left to the discretion of the trustees under cl. 2 of the deed; and, therefore, the trusts of the deed were of a charitable nature and the school was a charitable educational establishment, it being immaterial that the pupils might be required to pay the full value of the services which they received, and, as the land was used for and in connection with the purposes of the school, the condition contained in the second limb of s. 85 (1), viz., the provision in respect of the use of the land, was satisfied. Dictum of SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., in A.-G. v. Lonsdale (Earl) (1827) (1 Sim. 105), applied.

(ii) although the land in question was vested technically in the company and not in the trustees of the trust deed, which related to the trusts of the shares and not to the trusts of the land, the company, being an artificial person, could act only through its council, who were the trustees of the trust deed and, being strictly bound thereby, could use the property of the company only under its terms; while the property of the company was held nominally under the provisions of the memorandum and articles, it was, in fact, subject also to the provisions of the trust deed, and the company could apply its property and assets only for the charitable purposes mentioned in the deed; and, therefore, the interest in the land in question was held on charitable trusts or for charitable purposes, and s. 85 applied to it.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for (inter alia) a declaration that land belonging to the plaintiffs and used by them on and since July 1, 1948 (the "appointed day" under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947), for the purposes of their school was land to which s. 85 of the Act applied, being land an interest in which was held on charitable trusts or for charitable purposes and which was used at all material times for or in connection with the purposes for which the interest was held, within s. 85 (1).

On May 10, 1949, the plaintiffs' chartered surveyor applied to the Minister of Town and Country Planning for a determination under s. 92 (1) of the Act in respect of the land. By a letter, dated Apr. 5, 1950, the Minister informed the plaintiffs of his determination that the land was not land to which s. 85 of the Act applied. The plaintiffs thereupon appealed to the High Court, under s. 92 (2), by originating summons.

Under the Transfer of Functions (Minister of Health and Minister of Local Government and Planning) (No. 1) Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 142), art. 2, the title of the Minister of Town and Country Planning was changed to that of Minister of Local Government and Planning.

Upjohn, K.C., and Sir Norman Touche for the plaintiffs.

Denys B. Buckley for the Minister.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is an originating summons issued at the instance of a limited company by way of appeal, under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 92 (2), from a decision under s. 92 (1) of the Minister who was charged with the administration of the Act. The question which is in issue depends on the provisions of s. 85, which provides certain exemptions from charge in respect of the Act for property which is subject to charitable purposes. Section 85 (1) provides:

"This section applies to land an interest in which is held on charitable trusts or for ecclesiastical or other charitable purposes of any description if the land, as distinct from the rents and profits thereof, is used in any manner (including use in a manner involving the beneficial occupation of the land by any person) for or in connection with the purposes for which the said interest is held, and not otherwise . . . ”

The effect of that appears to be that two conditions must be fulfilled: (i) the interest in the land must be held on charitable trusts or for charitable purposes of some description, and (ii) the use of the land must be for or in connection with the purposes for which the said interest is held, i.e., charitable trusts or purposes.

The plaintiff company was formed in connection with a girls' school which had been carried on for a number of years by the Misses Florence, Margaret and Alice Judson, and it was incorporated on Dec. 31, 1926, under the Companies Acts, 1908 to 1917, with a share capital of £30,000 divided into 30,000 ordinary shares of £1 each. The number of shares which have been issued is 13,152. Originally 8,701 of those shares were held by Miss Florence Judson, 4,351 by Miss Alice Judson, and a hundred by a brother, Mr. William Judson. On Nov. 23, 1933, a deed of trust was executed and the shares were transferred to the trustees of that trust deed. On the same date the articles of association of the company were altered in certain respects, and it is only necessary for me to deal with the articles as amended on that day. The objects for which the company was established are stated in cl. 3 of its memorandum as follows:

“(a) To acquire, develop, extend, and carry on the school at Malvern Wells, in the county of Worcester, hitherto conducted by Florence Judson, Margaret Judson and Alice Judson, and known as the Abbey, Malvern Wells, and all boarding-houses, hostels, schools and other enterprises carried on in connection therewith either at Malvern Wells or elsewhere in the United Kingdom or abroad, and for that purpose to enter into the agreements referred to in art. 5 of the accompanying articles of association, and carry the same into effect, with or without modification. (b) Generally to establish and carry on schools, boarding-houses, hostels and institutions with the object of providing a liberal education for girls and sound religious training. (c) To purchase, take on lease, or agreement of tenancy or otherwise acquire school buildings, boarding-houses, dwellings for teachers or other persons employed in the business of the company, recreation grounds and other buildings or lands and such copyrights, books, stationery, fittings, furniture and other things as may be necessary and convenient for the educational business of the company.”

There follow a number of powers which are commonly conferred by the memorandum of a limited company. Paragraphs (n) and (p) are:

“(n) To accept and hold as trustee or otherwise and deal with any funds, grants, pensions, legacies and endowments and to undertake any trusts which it may seem expedient to the company to undertake for assisting or furthering the general objects of the company. (p) To do all such other lawful things as the company may deem incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects or any of them.”

By art. 3 of the company's articles of association: “The affairs of the company shall be managed by a council.” By art. 4 the company is to be a private company, and art. 5 records that the company is formed for the purpose of acquiring from the Misses Judson the school heretofore carried on by them and known as the Abbey, Malvern Wells, on the terms of an agreement which is therein referred to. Articles 64 to 68 contain the provisions dealing with the council. Article 64, which was altered on Nov. 23, 1933, now reads as follows:

“The council shall consist of the persons who are for the time being the trustees of a trust deed dated Nov. 23, 1933, and made between Florence Judson and Alice Judson of the first part, the several persons whose names are set out in the schedule thereto as parties of the second part, and the company of the third part. Accordingly the present trustees of the said trust deed are the present members of the council, and every person who hereafter becomes a trustee of the said trust deed shall ipso facto become a member of the council."

Article 65 provides that no share qualification is necessary for a member of the council. Article 66 prohibits the members of the council receiving remuneration for their services, except that they may receive the sum of five guineas as expenses. Article 67 provides:

A "The council may in the management of the affairs of the company exercise all such powers of the company as are not by law or by these articles required to be exercised by the company in general meeting, subject, nevertheless, to any regulations of these articles or any special provisions as to the management and regulation of the school therein contained and to the provisions of any statute and to such directions, not being inconsistent with the aforesaid regulations or provisions, as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting."

B Article 68, headed "Disqualification of members of the council," provides:

C "The office of a member of the council shall be vacated: (a) If he for any reason ceases to be a trustee of the said trust deed . . ."

Article 74 provides:

"The company in general meeting may declare dividends to be paid to members in proportion to the amounts paid up on their shares. No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits of the company, and no dividend shall carry interest against the company."

D Article 77 contains a provision in regard to equalising dividends. Articles 84 to 89 deal with regulations of the school, and provide inter alia that the appointment of the head mistress shall rest with the council. Article 88 provides that the internal regulation of the school shall be under the sole management of the head mistress as regards certain things which are mentioned therein. Article 89 provides:

E "The annual sums and other fees to be paid for the tuition of each pupil by her parent or guardian or for the boarding and maintenance of such pupil during the continuance of such pupil at any school or hostel shall be fixed by the council and shall be paid to the treasurer or other proper officer in advance or otherwise by such periodical payments as the council may direct. In case of any default in payment in advance or otherwise, the entrance or return to school of any pupil in respect of whose account such default has been made may be suspended by the council until payment either by means of general regulations or in any particular case."

F It is clear from the memorandum and articles that the company has the power to make profits and to distribute dividends.

G The trust deed of Nov. 23, 1933, which was referred to in the articles, was made between Florence Judson and Alice Judson (described as "the founders"), of the first part, a number of persons whose names are set out in the schedule and who are described as "the present trustees," of the second part, and the Abbey, Malvern Wells, Ltd., i.e., the company, of the third part. All the persons whose names are set out in the schedule appear to be of a respected character, and some of them are connected with education. The recitals refer first to the carrying on of the school prior to the incorporation of the company, to the incorporation of the company in 1926, and to the facts as to the issue of the capital. Then recital (d) says:

H "The founders being desirous of establishing an educational trust in order to secure that the said school shall henceforth be carried on under the guidance of a body of persons interested in the education of girls and with a view to promoting solely the educational work and efficiency of the said school intend forthwith to transfer or cause to be transferred the said 13,152 ordinary shares in the company into the names of the present trustees or of some of them (not being less than three in number) to the intent that the said shares shall be held upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions hereinafter contained."

Clause 1 contains definitions referring to the school, the trustees and the council, which is defined as meaning "the council referred to in the articles of association of the company." Clause 2 provides:

"The said shares when transferred as aforesaid shall be held upon trust for the benefit of the school and all dividends and other moneys derived therefrom shall be dealt with in such manner as the trustees in their discretion shall think advisable with a view to promoting the educational work and efficiency of the school."

Clause 3 and cl. 4 provide:

"3. The said shares shall be held in the names of the trustees or of such of their number (not being less than three) as the trustees shall from time to time appoint. All voting rights attached to the said shares shall be exercised in such manner as the trustees in their discretion shall from time to time consider advisable for the purpose of promoting the educational work and efficiency of the school; and without derogating from the generality of the foregoing provision it is hereby declared that if the trustees shall think it desirable for the purpose aforesaid the said voting rights may from time to time be exercised with a view to effecting such alterations in the memorandum and articles of association of the company as the trustees shall think advisable (including if the trustees consider it desirable the insertion of provisions to the effect that no dividends shall be paid on any of the shares in the company and that in the event of a winding-up of the company no part of the assets of the company remaining after payment of the debts and liabilities of the company and the costs of liquidation shall be applied otherwise than for the advancement of the education of girls). 4. Provided that the said voting rights shall be exercised so as to procure (a) that the council shall as soon as practicable consist of the present trustees, (b) that the council shall thereafter consist of the trustees, and (c) that it shall not be necessary for a member of the council to hold any share qualification."

Those provisions of cl. 4 have been carried out.

By cl. 5:

"Provided also that the trustees shall secure either that no shares in the capital of the company are hereafter issued or that if any shares in the capital of the company are hereafter issued no dividends or other moneys derived therefrom shall be applied in any manner other than for the purpose of promoting the educational work and efficiency of the school."

Then there are certain administrative provisions about the proceedings of the trustees, a disqualification clause, and the provision for the appointment of new trustees, and a clause prohibiting remuneration for acting as a trustee, on similar lines to the clause in the articles of the company in regard to the members of the council. By cl. 11:

"If the school shall for any reason cease to be carried on the trusts hereinbefore declared shall thereupon determine and upon the determination of the said trusts the trustees shall thenceforth hold the said shares and any property and moneys representing such shares or derived therefrom upon trust to deal with the same in such manner for the advancement of the education of girls as the trustees in their absolute discretion shall determine."

The result of that trust deed is that the trustees are to operate the powers which they possess as the holders of the shares in the company so as to prevent the company being used for a profit-making concern, and so that the profit, if any, may be re-applied for the advancement of the educational work of the school.

The material date for the purposes of s. 85 of the Act of 1947 is July 1, 1948, the "appointed day" under the Act, and it is necessary, therefore, to consider what was the situation at that particular time. The land in question, which is partly freehold and partly leasehold, was used for the purpose of the building and grounds of the school, and, therefore, if the school be a charitable educational institution, there seems to be no doubt that the condition contained in the second limb of s. 85 (1), viz., the provision in respect of the use of the land, is satisfied, because it is used for and in connection with the purposes of the school, and not otherwise. The other condition which has to be satisfied is that the interests in question, freehold or leasehold, are held on charitable trusts or for charitable purposes. It is admitted by counsel for the plaintiffs that the conditions of s. 85 (1) could not be satisfied by a perusal of the memorandum and articles of association alone, as they permit a profit-making enterprise, but he relies on the combination of the memorandum and articles and the trust deed. I propose, therefore, to deal first with the provisions of the trust deed, because, unless it appears on the provisions of the trust deed that one is concerned with a purely charitable body with a charitable trust or purpose, the contentions made on behalf of the plaintiffs must fail.

The provisions of the trust deed are attacked by counsel for the Minister in two ways. He first referred to the provision in cl. 2 of the deed that the dividends and other moneys received from the shares "... shall be dealt with in such manner as the trustees in their discretion shall think advisable with a view to promoting the educational work and efficiency of the school."

He says that that is a provision which takes the matter outside the ambit of a charitable trust, because the decision depends, not on the purposes laid down by the trust deed, but on the discretion of the trustees, and, therefore, it is something which the court could not regulate, and, accordingly, it is not a matter which satisfies the definition of a binding charitable trust. In support of his contention, he relied on Oxford Group v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). In that case one of the grounds on which the Court of Appeal refused to declare that the Oxford Group, a company limited by guarantee, was a purely charitable body was that one of the powers given to the company by its memorandum was in terms, as counsel for the Minister alleges, similar to the provision in cl. 2 of the trust deed in the present case. The provision in question was:

"To do all such other things as are incidental, or the association may think conducive, to the attainment of the above objects or any of them."

It seems to me that the Oxford Group case (1) is distinguishable in two ways. First, as counsel for the plaintiffs points out, in the Oxford Group case (1) there was no trust deed limiting the powers of the directors or governing body, and, therefore, they had an unfettered discretion to exercise the powers conferred by the memorandum. Therefore, it was plain that matters which were in the discretion of the company could not be regulated by the court. In the present case the power of dealing with the dividends under cl. 2 of the trust deed is a power of trustees, and, as the court has power to regulate trustees and the manner in which they exercise their power, it seems to me that for that reason the present case is distinguishable from the Oxford Group case (1). Secondly, there is also a distinction, in my opinion, in the language of the provisions in the two cases, as cl. 2 of the trust deed, in the present case, provides for the application of the dividends and other moneys with a view to promoting the educational work and efficiency of the school, and it is merely the manner which is left to the discretion of the trustees. In other words, they may choose one or another manner of applying the money, but the application must be for promoting the educational work and efficiency of the school. Therefore, it seems to me that the Oxford Group case (1) really does not assist the question which I have to decide.

The other attack which is made by counsel for the Minister on the charitable nature of the trust deed is of a more general nature, and, as it seems to me, it is rather a startling proposition. He contends that an educational trust or an educational purpose is not charitable unless it be for the promotion of education for persons who pay less than the full value of the services which they receive. That seems to me a proposition which might at one time have been acceptable to the courts, but it is several centuries out of date. While the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4), which is regarded as the foundation of most charitable principles which we consider, refers to the "maintenance of . . . schools of learning, free schools, and scholars in universities," and also to the "education . . . of orphans," and at the beginning of the eighteenth century it was held that a school must be a free school if it was to be within the statute of Elizabeth, that view had been definitely abandoned by the nineteenth century. That that is so appears clearly from the observation of SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., in A.-G. v. Earl of Lonsdale (2), where he said (1 Sim. 109):

"The institution of a school for the sons of gentlemen is not, in popular language, a charity; but in view of the statute of Elizabeth, all schools for learning are so to be considered . . ."

Thus, all schools of learning, except those which exist purely as a profit-making venture (e.g., certain preparatory schools and what are known sometimes as "cramming establishments"), are to be considered charities. Therefore, the whole purpose of the trust deed of Nov. 23, 1933, being to secure the education of girls at the Abbey School on a non-profit-making basis, it is plain, in my opinion, that the trusts of the trust deed are of a charitable nature.

The next question is: Can it be said that the land in question, which is vested technically in the company, is held on charitable trusts and for charitable purposes? The strength of the Minister's case in this respect rests on the fact that the trustees do not own or hold the land, but only hold the shares. Counsel for the Minister contends that, accepting, for the sake of argument, that the trusts of the trust deed are charitable, they are trusts, not of the land, but only of the shares, and, for the purpose of s. 85 (1) of the Act of 1947, it is the trusts of the land which are material. I think that counsel for the plaintiffs is right when he says that the memorandum and articles of association and the trust deed cannot be treated as if they were entirely divorced from each other, and that one must look at the facts of the case. The first fact that I find is, of course, that the company is an artificial person. Although it is formed under the Companies Acts, it is just as much an artificial person as a corporation formed by statute or by royal charter, and, although it is a legal person, it is not a physical entity and it can only operate by means of human beings. Therefore, one has to see who operates the company and what their position is, as in Re French Protestant Hospital (3), which came before me recently. In that case a corporation formed by royal charter was technically the trustee, but I found that the corporation was controlled by a body of persons called the governor and directors. As the question was whether the governor and directors should receive remuneration, it seemed to me that I should look at the substance of the matter to see who really controlled the situation. I found that the governor and directors were just as much in the position of trustees as the corporation itself.

In the present case, it seems to me that one is entitled, and, indeed, bound, to look at the constitution of the company to see who, in fact, is in control. I find that, by art. 3 of the company's articles, the company is controlled entirely by a body called a council, a body of persons, and, by art. 64, that body of persons must be the trustees of the trust deed. Therefore, while the company, theoretically, has the power to apply its property and assets for the purpose of making profits and devoting the resulting profit to the distribution of dividends among the members, I find that the persons who regulate the operations of the company are not free persons unrestricted in their operations, but are the trustees of the trust deed, and, under the terms of the trust deed, they may use the property of the company only in a particular way and must not make use of the assets of the company for the purpose of a profit-making concern. I find that they are strictly bound by the trusts of the trust deed, and that those trusts are charitable trusts. It seems to me, therefore, that, while nominally the property of the company is held under the provisions of the memorandum and articles of association, in actual fact the property of the company is regulated by the terms of the memorandum and articles of association plus the provisions of the trust deed, and, therefore, the company is restricted in fact in the application of its property and assets and may apply them only for the charitable purposes which are mentioned in the trust deed.

That fact, in my view, distinguishes this case from Re Girls' Public Day School Trust, Ltd. (4), a decision of ROXBURGH, J. In that case, which was also under the Act of 1947 and depended on the provisions of s. 85, there were certain preferential shareholders who could obtain substantial benefits under the terms of the memorandum and articles of the company in question, but, by exercising some self-denial, which appears to have been entirely voluntary on their part, they did not exercise their rights for their own profit, but merely carried on the concern as an educational establishment. It does not appear clearly from the report, but I am told that there was nothing to prevent the shares in question being acquired by any person, so that some avaricious person might, if he had been so disposed, have acquired shares and exercised his rights to carry on the school and the company as a profit-making concern. That is not so in the present case. The trustees are prohibited by the trust deed from doing any such thing. They hold the shares and control the company merely as trustees. I am not prepared to consider that they might be capable of committing a breach of trust, as counsel for the Minister invited me to do. I must consider them in their situation as regulated by the trust deed and on the footing that they carry out their duties as required by the trust deed. It seems to me that those duties confine them to charitable purposes, and, therefore, as the company is controlled in that way, the property of the company is held on charitable trusts or for charitable purposes, and, accordingly, s. 85 of the Act of 1947 applies to the land in question.

Declaration accordingly.

MEHMET DOGAN BEY v. G. G. ABDENI & CO., LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), April 9, 10, 20, 1951.]

Damage—Remoteness—Breach of contract—Functions of judge and jury—Direction by judge—Finding by jury—Duty of arbitrator—De-valuation of pound sterling—Delay in payment of freight—Loss on conversion into foreign currency.

By a charterparty, dated July 8, 1949, a shipowner, who carried on business in Turkey, chartered a vessel to carry a cargo of barley from Syria to the United Kingdom. The charterparty provided that the freight should be paid in advance to the shipowner's agents in London who were instructed to remit it to the shipowner in Turkey. On Sept. 6, 1949, freight became payable, but it was not received by the agents from the charterers until Sept. 14. On Sept. 18 the British government de-valued the pound sterling and the rate of exchange of the Turkish pound to the pound sterling fell from 11·284 to 7·84. On Oct. 5 the agents obtained permission from the exchange control authorities to remit the money to Turkey, but, owing to the late payment of the freight and the de-valuation, the shipowner sustained a loss of £3,953. The shipowner having claimed this sum from the charterers on the ground that his loss arose through their failure to pay the freight in due time, the matter was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrator found that (i) the loss was not reasonably foreseeable by either party as liable to result from the freight not being paid on the due date; (ii) the charterers would not as reasonable persons have concluded that the loss was liable to result from the late payment, and (iii) the loss did not naturally and directly flow from the failure to pay on the due date, and, therefore, that the charterers were not liable.

HELD: on a question of remoteness of damage it was the function of the judge to direct the jury on the meaning of "natural and direct" or "reasonably foreseeable" consequences, on whether a particular head of damages was capable in law of falling within those phrases, and on whether there was evidence that a particular consequence was one to which those phrases applied; it was then for the jury to find as a fact whether certain damage was such a consequence, their conclusion, subject to there being evidence to support it, being final; in the present case, the arbitrator, being the tribunal of fact, had not misdirected himself on the law, and findings (i) (ii) and (iii) were findings of fact against which there was no appeal.

B SPECIAL CASE stated by an arbitrator.

The shipowner, Mehmet Dogan Bey, claimed damages from the charterers, G. G. Abdeni & Co., Ltd., for breach of the charterparty, alleging that the charterers' failure to pay freight at the time specified in the charterparty had resulted in a loss by him of £3,953. The charterers contended that the damage was too remote and this contention was upheld by the arbitrator.

Cur. adv. vult.

D Apr. 20. McNAIR, J., read the following judgment. This award stated in the form of a Special Case under s. 9 (1) (b) of the Arbitration Act, 1934, raises certain interesting questions as to the respective functions of the judge and jury in determining what damages are recoverable in the case of breach of contract, and, in particular, as to the recoverability of damages resulting from the de-valuation of the pound sterling.

E By a charterparty dated July 8, 1949, in the general form of the Uniform General Charter (Gencon), as revised in 1922 but modified in important respects to meet the needs of the parties, the owner of the steamship Tanar flying the Turkish flag chartered the vessel to G. G. Abdeni & Co., Ltd., of Beyrouth, to carry a full and complete cargo of barley in bulk from Lattakya, Syria, to the United Kingdom for a freight of 32s. 6d. per ton. Clause 4 of the charterparty provided that the freight should be

F "paid in London in advance, discountless on signing bills of lading, in sterling area funds to Messrs. S. Catsell & Co., Ltd., London, less loading disbursements, if any . . . cash for ordinary disbursements at port of loading should be advanced by charterers if required at highest rate of exchange subject to two per cent. to cover insurance and other expenses."

G The shipowner, Mehmet Dogan Bey, carries on business in Turkey, and S. Catsell & Co., Ltd. (to whom I shall refer as Catsell) were at all material times his brokers and agents in London and had so acted for him on previous occasions. The position as regards the remittance to the shipowner in Turkey was that the owner did not always instruct Catsell to remit freights to him in Turkey. Sometimes the freights recovered were retained by Catsell for payment of the owner's obligations in London or for repairs, so that there was no certainty that the shipowner would, in fact, require any particular freight to be remitted to him in Turkey either in whole or in part. Shortly after July 8, 1949, the date of the charterparty, Catsell received instructions from the owner to remit the charter freight to him in Turkey when received. The existence of these instructions was unknown to the charterers and they might at any time have been modified, though, in fact, they were not.

H On Sept. 3, 1949, the loading was completed at Lattakya, and, apparently, bills of lading were signed that day. The freight ought, accordingly, to have been paid in London either on Sept. 3, or at latest by Sept. 6, if a reasonable time after signing bills of lading is to be allowed. For the purpose of the argument before me it was agreed that freight should have been paid at latest by Sept. 6. It was not, however, until Sept. 7 that the charterers telegraphed to their London agents, Cargo Superintendents (London), Ltd., that they were remitting the sum of £10,512, representing the freight less loading port disbursements. Owing to some unexplained delay this sum did not reach Cargo Superintendents' bank in London until Sept. 13, with the result that it was not until Sept. 14 that Cargo Superintendents were able to hand their cheque to Catsell. On Thursday, Sept. 15, Catsell paid the cheque into their account with their bankers and it was cleared the same day. They did not, however, take any immediate steps to apply either through their bankers or at all for permission under the Exchange Control Act, 1947, to remit the whole or any part of the money received to the owner in Turkey. On Sunday, Sept. 18, 1949, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom proposed forthwith to de-value the pound sterling in terms of United States dollars. The pound sterling/U.S. dollar official rate of exchange which prior to that date had stood at $4.0325 to the pound sterling thereafter became $2.80 to the pound sterling. The Turkish pound was not de-valued on Sept. 18 or at any material time thereafter, and, accordingly, whereas before Sept. 18, 1949, the official Turkish pound/pound sterling rate of exchange had been 11.284 Turkish pounds to the pound sterling, after Sept. 18, 1949, the official Turkish pound/pound sterling rate of exchange became 7.84 Turkish pounds to the pound sterling. Monday, Sept. 19, was a bank holiday, and on Tuesday, Sept. 20, Catsell applied to the Bank of England for permission to transmit £9,000, part of the £10,512 received, but, owing to pressure of business on the exchange control authorities, permission was not granted until Oct. 5, 1949, when immediate remittance was made. If remittance of £9,000 had been made at any time before Sept. 18, 1949, the shipowner would have received 101,556 Turkish pounds, but, in fact, he received only 70,560 Turkish pounds as the result of the remittance of £9,000 on Oct. 5. The difference between these two sums amounts to 30,996 Turkish pounds, which, converted into pounds sterling at the rate of 7.84 Turkish pounds to the pound sterling, equals £3,953 11s. 2d. Accordingly, it can be stated that but for the late payment of the freight and the de-valuation on Sept. 18, the shipowner would not have suffered this particular loss, namely, £3,953 which he claimed before me. The arbitrator found: (a) that the possibility that the pound sterling could be de-valued in terms of United States dollars during 1949 had been the subject of frequent discussions in the British, United States, and European Press both before and after July 8, 1949, but that, on the other hand, any intention on the part of H.M. government in the United Kingdom to de-value the pound sterling in terms of United States dollars had been repeatedly denied by the Chancellor of the Exchequer both before and after that date, and (b) that the charterers, their servants or agents possessed no actual knowledge either on July 8, 1949, or at any material time thereafter that, if the freight was not paid on the signing of the bills of lading or within a reasonable time thereafter, the shipowner would suffer the loss claimed.

The crucial paragraph of the award is in these terms:

" 22. In so far as the following matters are questions of fact I further find and in so far as they are questions of law I hold that: (i) The [charterers] paid the freight due under the charterparty to Catsell on behalf of the [shipowner] at a date later than that upon which the freight became due and payable and thereby committed a breach of the charterparty. (ii) If the [charterers] had not committed this breach of the charterparty, the [shipowner] would not have suffered the loss of £3,953 11s. 2d. claimed by him in this arbitration. (iii) The loss claimed by the [shipowner] was not reasonably foreseeable on July 8, 1949, or at any material time thereafter by either the [shipowner] or the [charterers] as liable to result from the freight not being paid by the [charterers] in accordance with the [charterers'] obligations under the charterparty. (iv) The [charterers] would not, if they had considered the matter on July 8, 1949, or at any material time thereafter, as reasonable persons have concluded that the loss claimed by the [shipowner] was liable to result from the freight not being paid by the [charterers] in accordance with the [charterers'] obligations under the charterparty. (v) The loss claimed by the [shipowner] did not naturally and directly flow from the freight not having been paid by the [charterers] in accordance with the [charterers'] obligations under the charterparty."

Neither of the two findings or holdings set out in sub-paras. (i) and (ii) was challenged before me. The question of law left for the decision of the court, by the Case was, in effect, whether, on the arbitrator's findings of fact, the shipowner was entitled to the sum of £3,953 11s. 2d. as damages for breach of the charterers' obligations to pay the freight in London not later than Sept. 6, 1949. Subject to the decision of the court on this question the arbitrator awarded and adjudged that the claim failed.

Counsel for the shipowner conceded that, if the issues raised in paras. (iii), (iv) and (v) were issues of fact and not of law, the shipowner's claim must fail. He argued, however, that in contract at least the question of remoteness of damage is always a question of law, or, at least, a question of mixed law and fact for the judge and not for the jury, and he relied in particular on the statement of BLACKBURN, J. (L.R. 10 Q.B. 122), in Hobbs v. London & South Western Ry. Co. (1) that the question of remoteness ought never to be left to a jury, the statement by LORD ESHER, M.R. (20 Q.B.D. 89) in Hammond & Co. v. Bussey (2) that the question of what may be reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties as the result of a breach of contract is not one for the jury, and the statement by FARWELL, L.J. ([1911] 2 K.B. 797) in Chaplin v. Hicks (3) that the question of remoteness is for the judge and the question of assessment is for the jury. Reference was also made to the judgment of BRETT, L.J., in McMahon v. Field (4). This is, no doubt, a formidable body of judicial opinion. On the other hand, there are, in my view, equally strong indications to the contrary in the speeches in the House of Lords in Monarch S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A.B.) (5). In that case LORD PORTER ([1949] 1 All E.R. 6, 7), in distinguishing The Malcolm Baxter, Jr. (6), relies on the statement by STONE, J., delivering the judgment of the United States Supreme Court, that "there is no finding, nor is it suggested, that at the time when the contract of affreightment was entered into . . . the embargo could reasonably have been foreseen . . ." I think that STONE, J., in this passage is clearly referring to a finding of fact, or rather the absence of a finding of fact, by the trial judge. LORD WRIGHT (ibid., 13) states that remoteness of damage is in truth a question of fact and supports this by a reference to the speech of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., in British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. Underground Electric Rys. Co. of London, Ltd. (7) where LORD HALDANE had said ([1912] A.C. 688) that

"The quantum of damage is a question of fact, and the only guidance the law can give is to lay down general principles which afford at times but scanty assistance in dealing with particular cases."

I do not read the language used by LORD HALDANE as referring only to the numerical assessment of the damages in terms of money. I think that LORD HALDANE must have had in mind the function of the jury under proper direction of selecting the heads of damages in respect of which a monetary assessment has to be made. Finally in the Monarch Steamship case (5) LORD DU PARCQ says ([1949] 1 All E.R. 19):

"I do not doubt the wisdom of the judges who, in Hadley v. Baxendale (8) and the many later cases which interpreted or explained that classic decision, have laid down rules or principles for the guidance of those whose duty it is, as judges or jurymen, to assess damages. When those rules or principles are applied, however, it is essential to remember what my noble and learned friend, LORD WRIGHT, and LORD HALDANE in the passage cited by him, have emphasised—that in the end what has to be decided is a question of fact, and, therefore, a question proper for a jury. Circumstances are so infinitely various that, however carefully general rules are framed, they must be construed with some liberality and not too rigidly applied. It was necessary to lay down principles lest juries should be persuaded to do injustice by imposing an undue, or, perhaps, an inadequate, liability on a defendant.”

Later the same learned Lord says (ibid.):

“I may express my own opinion by saying that, if a jury, directed in the terms in which the Lord President’s opinion shows us that he would have directed them, had awarded the respondent the sum of £21,634 as damages, there would have been no ground for setting aside or varying the verdict.”

The apparent inconsistency between the expressions of opinion in the four cases referred to above as being relied on by counsel for the shipowner and the speeches in the Monarch Steamship case (5) can, in my judgment, be resolved if it is accepted, as I think it must be, that it is the function of the judge to direct the jury as to the meaning of the terms “natural and direct consequences” or “reasonably foreseeable consequences”, whether a particular head of damage is capable in law of being a consequence falling within these phrases, and whether there is any evidence that a particular consequence is a consequence falling within these phrases, and that it is then for the jury to find as a fact whether a particular head of damage is such a consequence, their conclusion on that point (subject to there being evidence to support it) being final. The matter was, in my opinion, so treated in Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (9). In that case the third question left to the jury, to which they returned an affirmative answer, was whether the actions for libel brought by Lowe and Comins against the plaintiff and the damages recovered by them were “the natural and probable consequences of the proved negligence of the [defendant].” The jury answered the question in the affirmative and they then assessed the monetary figure of damages. LORD DUNEDIN, after referring with approval to Scotts’ Trustees v. Moss (10) in which the Inner House had granted an issue to the jury which asked the question whether what had happened was the natural and probable result of what the defendant had done, stated ([1920] A.C. 975) that in the case then before the House he had come to the conclusion that there was no evidence which entitled the jury to give the affirmative answer they did to the question put to them: see also the speech of LORD SUMNER (ibid., 988). It is significant that neither of these masters of the common law suggested that the issue of remoteness was never one for the jury under a proper direction. The judgment of DEVLIN, J., in Royal Greek Government v. Minister of Transport (11) (83 Ll.L. Rep. 236) is, as I read it, to the same effect.

If this conclusion as to the effect of the authorities is correct, then, in my judgment, the findings of the learned arbitrator in paras. (iii), (iv) and (v) are findings of fact conclusively determining the issue in this case against the shipowner, the form of the findings and the citation of authorities in the case negating any misdirection in law. I may add that, if this dispute had been tried in the Commercial Court, as it might have been, with the assistance of a City of London special jury, I can imagine no question more proper to be put to such a jury than the question whether this particular form of loss, namely, damages resulting from the de-valuation of the pound sterling, was reasonably foreseeable by commercial men on July 8, 1949, and if the jury, properly directed, had answered the question in the negative, as the learned arbitrator did here, then their verdict would not, in my judgment, be open to challenge. Had I, however, felt able to accept the submission of counsel for the shipowner that the question of recoverability of the particular form of damages claimed was a pure question of law or a mixed question of law and of fact to be determined solely by the judge as is the question of frustration or the question of the implication of terms into a contract, I should on the facts found by the arbitrator in the other paragraphs of his award have reached the same conclusion as the arbitrator. Accepting the principles stated by ASQUITH, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (12) it would, in my judgment, be to require a wholly unreasonable standard of prevision in the Syrian charterers in the present case to hold that on July 8, 1949, when they entered into the charterparty they ought reasonably to have foreseen that there was a serious possibility or real danger that if they did not pay the freight on the due date the loss claimed would result. The incurring of the loss depended on a series of future contingencies including the contingencies that the shipowner would require immediate remission of the money to Turkey, that de-valuation of the pound sterling should take place at or about the due date of payment, and that such de-valuation would not be accompanied by a corresponding de-valuation of the Turkish pound. It appears from the award that even early in September there was no reason to suppose that de-valuation was imminent since the arbitrator finds that Catsell did not act unreasonably in not seeking permission from the Bank of England in advance to remit the whole or part of the freight as soon as it might be received by them, though this course was open to them.

The conclusions stated above make it unnecessary for me to deal with a number of other submissions advanced by counsel for the charterers, namely (i) that, even if foreseeability of consequences is the test of recoverability of damages, there must, for the shipowner to succeed, also be an affirmative finding by the arbitrator on the question of causation; (ii) that as a matter of law any change in the rate of exchange during the contractual period and, a fortiori, if subsequent to the date of breach, is too remote to give rise to a claim in damages unless there is a specific term in the contract dealing with such a contingency or the risk has been brought to the attention of the party in default at the time of the contract and he has contracted to accept that risk; (iii) that, where there is a breach of contract involving in the assessment of damages a reference to foreign currency, the rate of conversion for sterling is the rate ruling at the date of the breach. In my judgment, the cases of Di Ferdinando v. Simon, Smits & Co. (13), and, in particular, the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1920] 3 K.B. 415) and S.S. Celia v. S.S. Volturno (14), go a long way towards supporting these propositions. Nor is it necessary for me to decide whether there are any exceptions, and, if so, whether the present case falls within the exceptions, to the general principle stated by WILLES, J., in Fletcher v. Tayleur (15) that, "... in the case of non-payment of money the measure of damages is, the interest of the money only."

For the reasons given above I answer the question of law stated in the Special Case in the negative with the result that the arbitrator's award stands.

Award of the arbitrator upheld.

Bankruptcy—Proof—Money employed in setting up business—Creditor interested in business and benefitting thereby, but not a partner or receiving share of profits.

Between June 20, 1949, and Oct. 7, 1950, the appellant advanced to the bankrupt sums, amounting to £7,218 15s. 8d., which were used by the bankrupt in setting up a residential riding academy. There was no agreement between the parties for the repayment of the moneys, the payment of any interest thereon, or the giving of any security in respect thereof. Although not married to the bankrupt, the appellant lived with him and looked after the domestic side of the academy, and in the brochure advertising the academy the bankrupt and she were referred to as Mr. and Mrs. M., she being described as one of the "principals." There was no arrangement for her to receive any defined share of the profits and she was not a partner, but the enterprise was intended to provide her, as well as the bankrupt, with a home and a living. On Oct. 5, 1950, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt on his own petition, and the adjudication order was made on Oct. 11. On Nov. 11, 1950, the appellant lodged a proof for the sum of £7,218 15s. 8d. paid by her to the bankrupt, claiming that it was a loan to him at his request and alleging that she had no control over the manner in which he used it.

HELD: the sums paid by the appellant to the bankrupt did not constitute, and were never intended to constitute, a loan, but represented her contribution to the capital of a business enterprise in which she had an interest and which was carried on for their joint benefit; it was immaterial that she was not a partner and received no share of the profits of the business; therefore, she was not a creditor of the bankrupt, as the person carrying on the business, in respect of those sums, and was not entitled to prove in the bankruptcy in competition with the creditors of the business.

APPEAL from an order of His Honour JUDGE HAMILTON, made at Northampton County Court on Feb. 13, 1951, whereby he dismissed the appellant's appeal from a decision of the bankrupt's trustee in bankruptcy rejecting the appellant's claim to prove as a creditor in the bankruptcy on the ground that she had allowed the money advanced by her to the bankrupt to be employed in the bankrupt's business. The trustee's decision was upheld by the county court judge on the authority of Re Beale. Ex p. Corbridge, (1876) (4 Ch.D. 246; 46 L.J.Bey. 17). On an appeal to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy, the appellant contended inter alia that Re Beale (supra) was distinguishable on the facts and that the learned county court judge was wrong in law and misdirected himself in his conclusion that he was bound by Re Beale (supra). The facts appear in the judgment of ROMER, J.

A. W. M. Davies for the appellant.

Vaughan, K.C., and J. G. Le Quesne for the trustee.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 28. The following judgments were read.

ROMER, J.: This is an appeal from an order of His Honour JUDGE HAMILTON, dated Feb. 13, 1951, whereby he dismissed the appeal of the appellant, Florence Annie Humber, against the decision of the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr. A. G. W. Meade rejecting the proof of the debt of the appellant for the sum of £7,314 8s. 8d. A receiving order was made against the bankrupt on his own petition on Oct. 5, 1950, and the order of adjudication was dated Oct. 11. B On Nov. 11, 1950, the appellant swore a proof in the bankruptcy for the above mentioned sum which she described as "the balance of money advanced and payments made for and on behalf of the bankrupt at his request." This claim was rejected by the trustee on the ground that the appellant allowed her money to be used in the bankrupt's business. On Jan. 11, 1951, the trustee wrote to the C appellant intimating that, in the event of the court reversing his decision and in view of a certain deduction from the appellant's claim to which he referred, such claim would be allowed in the sum of £7,218 15s. 8d. This deduction and consequential net claim have been accepted by the appellant.

In support of her claim the appellant submitted two not very easily intelligible statements of payments which she had made to a firm of solicitors who were acting for her and for the bankrupt and of the manner in which that firm, Messrs. Cecil Godfrey and Sons, had expended those and other moneys on behalf of the bankrupt. On her appeal to the Northampton County Court from the trustee's rejection of her proof the appellant swore an affidavit in which she said:

"I say that in respect of each of the various sums of money in the aggregate making up my said proof of debt, that the same were advanced by me or by my solicitors to the said bankrupt by way of loan without control on my part as to the manner in which the said sums were to be or were in fact used, although I was well aware that at the material time the said bankrupt purchased Murcott House, Long Buckby, in the county of Northampton, for use as a dwelling-house, and also for the purpose of carrying on his business as a riding school proprietor, and that he was there carrying on the said business. I am not and I have at no time been a partner in the said or any other business of the said bankrupt, and no arrangement was ever made between myself and the said bankrupt for the said sums of money to be repaid to me by way of a share in the profits of the said business, or for me in any other manner to receive a fixed or any share of the said profits."

G

Then she exhibits to that affidavit a copy of the account of the sums of money which she had advanced. She then goes on:

H

"I respectfully submit that if and in so far as the said sums of money have been used in the said business of the said bankrupt, and even if I allowed the same to be so used, which I deny, as I had no control over the use of the same, as set out above, that such use of the said money is not a good and valid ground for the rejection of my said proof of debt."

In answer to this affidavit the trustee filed an affidavit in which he said:

"... I am informed by the said bankrupt, and verily believe, that the said bankrupt bought Murcott House, Long Buckby, Northamptonshire, at some date between October, 1949, and February, 1950, and opened a residential riding academy at the said house in February, 1950. I am further informed by the said bankrupt, and verily believe, that, excepting the sum of £3,250 lent by a building society on a mortgage all the money needed for the purchase of the said house and the setting up of the said riding academy was provided by the [appellant]. 4. It appears from the vouchers submitted to me by the [appellant] in support of her proof that the whole of the sum of £7,218 15s. 8d. claimed by the [appellant] was spent on the purchase of the said house and of horses, equipment, furniture, and sundry other items necessary for the carrying on of the business of the said riding academy. It further appears from the statements of Messrs. Cecil Godfrey and Sons, exhibited to the said affidavit of the [appellant], that the moneys making up the said sum of £7,218 15s. 8d. were paid over between June 20, 1949, and Oct. 7, 1950, to meet the requirements of the said business from time to time. 5. No evidence has been submitted to me of any agreement between the [appellant] and the said bankrupt for the repayment of the said moneys or the payment of interest thereon, or of the giving of any security in respect of the said moneys. 6. I respectfully submit that the [appellant] allowed her money to be employed in the business of the said bankrupt and to be exposed to all the hazards of the said business, with the consequence that she is not now entitled to claim repayment in competition with the creditors of the said bankrupt."

The trustee exhibited to his affidavit a brochure advertising "Murcott House. Residential Riding Academy." The appellant, although not married to the bankrupt, had been living with him for some time prior to his bankruptcy and on p. 5 of the exhibited brochure the "principals" of the academy are stated to be "Major and Mrs. G. Meade." On p. 6 of the brochure there appears the statement that: "Students enjoy a family life under the personal supervision of Mrs. G. Meade", and on p. 10 it is stated:

"The physical and social life of junior students is under the careful supervision of Mrs. G. Meade. The principals will be pleased to arrange terms for parents of students wishing to spend holidays with their children while undergoing instruction."

It is admitted that the "Mrs. G. Meade" here referred to is the appellant. The trustee also exhibited to his affidavit a copy of the letter heading used at the academy in which the principals thereof are described as "Mr. and Mrs. G. Meade."

At the hearing before the county court judge oral evidence was given. The appellant said that the bankrupt decided what the moneys which she advanced should be spent on and that she herself had no control over the expenditure. Her explanation of the presence of her name in the brochure was that she was looking after the domestic side of Murcott House and would have looked after the children under sixteen (had there been any) and interviewed their parents. She said that she never made any arrangement to receive any share of the profits of the academy and was not going to become a partner in the enterprise, though she did think of introducing her daughter into it if it was successful. She explained this in cross-examination by saying that her daughter understood about and was interested in horses and she (the appellant) was not. In further cross-examination she said that she first knew the bankrupt about three years previously and discussed with him the starting of the riding school, and that she knew that he had no money, that the house was in part to be bought and the venture started with her money, and that the money which she caused to be paid to him or by his direction was being used for this venture. She admitted further that the whole of the sum for which she was proving in the bankruptcy was spent for the purposes of the business, that the hope was that the riding school would produce profits and that the household would be supported by means of them, and that she was content that her money should be used in the business and exposed to the risks of the business. She also said that she herself lived in Murcott House with the bankrupt and that nothing was ever mentioned as to repayment of any of the moneys which she advanced for the purchase of the house and the purposes of the business.

A In the course of his judgment the learned judge said that it was obvious that the appellant was advancing moneys to the bankrupt for all kinds of purposes, including the purchase of horses for the academy as well as for the purchase of the house itself, grooms' wages, housekeeper's wages, telephone calls and rental, rates and so on. The judge said that there could be no doubt in his view that the appellant did lend or entrust her money to the bankrupt for the purpose of the business and that

B "... the object of putting her money into [the bankrupt's] hands was so that he could buy the house, set up and run the business and furnish and equip the house and run it with the assistance of [the appellant], who did take a part [by running the domestic side of the business]."

In view of these conclusions the learned judge upheld the trustee's decision and dismissed the appeal on the authority of Re Beale. Ex p. Corbridge (1).

C This decision was much canvassed in argument before this court and counsel for the respondent trustee contended that that case and certain authorities which preceded it establish a proposition which is stated in WACE ON BANKRUPTCY (1904 ed.), p. 150, in the following terms:

"Where a person has authorised the employment of his assets in a business he cannot prove in competition with the creditors of the business in respect of the assets so authorised to be employed."

D Before considering Re Beale (1) and the other cases, it would be convenient to summarise the argument on this point of counsel for the appellant. He argued that the moneys advanced by her were a loan to the bankrupt, and that, having regard to the provisions of s. 30 and s. 33 (7) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, these moneys constitute a provable debt ranking pari passu with the debts to the other creditors, and that the only provision in the Act relating to postponement which might be regarded as relevant is s. 36, but that section is not, in fact, relevant inasmuch as the appellant was not the bankrupt's wife. Indeed, counsel used s. 36 (2) to found an argument in favour of the appellant by saying that the fact that the section specifically postpones a wife who lends money to her husband for the purposes of his business indicates that a woman who lends money for business purposes to anyone who is not her husband is not similarly postponed, for otherwise there would be no point in s. 36 (2) at all. From these considerations counsel for the appellant proceeded to the conclusion that the learned county court judge was wrong in acceding to the view that the bankrupt's other creditors have priority over the claim of the appellant.

F We will now consider the effect on this argument of Re Beale (1) and the earlier authorities to which BACON, C.J., made reference in that case. The facts in Re Beale (1), as taken from the report in the LAW REPORTS, were as follows:

G "John Beale, a wine merchant at Sheffield, filed a liquidation petition in 1876, under which Cooper Corbridge was appointed trustee. In July, 1857, Beale had gone through the ceremony of marriage with Mary Walker, a sister of his then deceased wife, and had after that lived with her as his wife. On Aug. 1, 1876, Mary Walker tendered to the trustee a proof for £3,000 'for money lent, advanced, and paid' by her to Beale, at his request, in the year 1858. The trustee rejected the proof, and Mary Walker applied to the county court for an order to admit it. In support of her application she filed an affidavit, in which she stated that in August, 1858, a legacy of £3,000, to which she was entitled under the will of her father, who had died in March, 1858, was paid by her direction to Beale. The payment was made to him in pursuance of and in reliance upon an agreement made between Beale and herself, after her father's death and prior to the payment to Beale, that the legacy should be advanced to and used by Beale in the business of a wine and spirit merchant which he then carried on; but that as to £2,000, part thereof, he should be a trustee of it for Mary Walker, and that a settlement to carry out the agreement should be executed by him after the receipt of the £3,000. In fact, no settlement was ever executed. Beale made an affidavit to the same effect. The story was also confirmed by the evidence of Henry Walker, a brother of Mary Walker. The only evidence in opposition was that of the trustee, who said that, though he was appointed receiver and manager of the business of Beale immediately after he filed his petition, and assisted him in preparing his accounts for presentation to the first meeting of the creditors, yet nothing was said to him about the claim of Mary Walker until after the first meeting. The judge admitted the proof to the extent of £2,000. The trustee appealed."

The judgment of BACON, C.J., was as follows (4 Ch.D. 248):

"It cannot be denied that this is a very singular case, but the circumstances furnish an explanation of the origin of the transaction. The respondent and the debtor were, to all intents and purposes, married, except for the provisions of the law of England. He being engaged in business, she, as any good wife would have done, allowed him to have her money to employ in his business. Stopping there, what was there wrong in the transaction? Was not the money exposed to all the hazards of the business? Had not the creditors of the business a right to say that they were entitled to be paid out of the assets in priority to the lender of the money which had been employed in the business? That is the principle of the decisions in Ex p. Garland (2), Ex p. Butterfield (3), and Re Childs (4). The trader goes into the world and deals with the money as part of his assets. It is said that a trust of it was created on behalf of the lender, but that is a trust repugnant to the first destination of the money. If there is a surplus after paying the creditors in full, Mary Walker may have a good equity against it, but that is her only right. In Ex p. Butterfield (3) the proof was attempted to be made on behalf of the estate of a dead man; in the present case it is on behalf of a living woman: that is the only distinction. The trust set up is wholly repugnant to the original stipulation for the loan. [Counsel for the respondent] says that the case of Re Childs (4) has no application to the present case. I agree that it has no direct application, but it recognises the principle of Ex p. Butterfield (3) and Ex p. Garland (2). There a man had carried on two separate businesses, a share in one of which had belonged to his wife before he married her, and he had entered into a covenant that the profits of her share of that business should be for her separate use. The lords justices held that on his bankruptcy there must be a separate administration of the assets of the two businesses, and that if there was any surplus of the husband's share of that estate in which the wife was interested, it must go over to the other estate. The judgment of JAMES, L.J., is distinct. In my opinion the principle is plain. It is not said that Mary Walker participated directly in the profits of the business, but that the business was in a certain sense carried on for the joint benefit of herself and the debtor no one can doubt. The Partnership Act of 1868 is imperative that a person who lends money to a partnership, on an agreement that he is to receive a share of the profits, cannot call for payment of his money until after the creditors of the partnership have been paid in full. If that statute has any application to this case the result is plain. Mary Walker knew that the money was to be employed in the business, and if she had sued the debtor while he was solvent it would have been a sufficient answer for him to say, I have employed the money in my business, and I have lost it all; there is none of the £2,000 left. The true principle is pointed out by Ex p. Garland (2) and Ex p. Butterfield (3); no proof can be admitted in respect of a trust which is inconsistent with the application of the money which the lender has pointed out. The order of the county court judge must be discharged, but I think that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I ought not to give the appellant any costs."

The judgment as reported in the LAW JOURNAL REPORTS differs in some respects from the report in the LAW REPORTS. In the LAW JOURNAL REPORTS, BACON, C.J., is reported to have said (46 L.J.Bcy. 17):

A "These two persons were married, and though the marriage was not legal in this country they lived to all intents as husband and wife . . . There is no doubt that the money must be exposed to all the hazards of the business, and subject to the claims of its creditors. That is the principle of Ex p. Garland (2), of the case before LORD COTTENHAM, and of Re Childs (4). Then it is said there was a trust for the wife. But the money had been
B previously advanced and subjected to the contingencies of the business; the trust alleged is something repugnant to the destination originally given to the fund. If any part of the fund remained from the business there might be a trust between the husband and wife; but that is not what is set up."

C After referring to the judgment of JAMES, L.J., in Re Childs (4), the learned judge proceeded (ibid., 18):

"That shows plainly that he who provides part of the capital of a business cannot call for payment till the creditors of the business are paid."

The judgment in Re Beale (1) is somewhat obscured (i) by the fact that the learned judge, although recognising the invalidity in this country of the marriage
D between Mr. and Mrs. Beale, does seem to have treated them for some purposes as husband and wife—indeed, in one passage in the report in the LAW JOURNAL REPORTS he refers to them under that description, and (ii) by his reference, in the report in the LAW REPORTS, to the Partnership Act, 1868. Having regard, however, to the issue involved and to the arguments of counsel, we think that the true ratio decidendi of the case lies in the passage in the report in the LAW
E JOURNAL REPORTS that

"... he who provides part of the capital of a business cannot call for payment till the creditors of the business are paid."

The learned judge was clearly applying that principle to the £2,000 which was in question and rejecting the contention that the principle was displaced by the F operation of the trust to which the fund had been subjected.

Ex p. Garland (2) and Ex p. Butterfield (3) were both cases in which a testator authorised the use in a business of a part of his general estate. In each case the authority so conferred was exercised, and, on the subsequent failure of the person to whom the business was given, the trustees, as representing the persons beneficially interested in the general estate, sought to prove in respect of the moneys
G so used in competition with the other creditors of the business. In each case the claim was rejected, LORD ELDON, L.C., according to the report of Ex p. Garland (2), immediately expressing a clear opinion against it. In Scott v. Izon (5) SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., expressed his view as to this class of case as follows (34 Beav. 438):

H "Many cases were cited to me to prove that when a testator has authorised the employment of his estate in trade, though the firm in which it was so employed becomes bankrupt, no proof can be made against the estate of the bankrupts in respect of such money of the testator so employed. This, no doubt, is correct, but it only proves that, as the testator's money was employed properly in this trade and without any breach of trust, the amount so employed could not be proved against the estate of the partners, if they had become bankrupts, as it was not a debt of the firm, but merely capital brought into it."

Re Childs (4) lends, perhaps, some support to the decision of BACON, C.J., in Re Beale (1), although the point in issue and decided in Re Childs (4) was a distinct one, viz., that, if a man carried on two businesses in different capacities (e.g., one as beneficial owner and one as executor) and became bankrupt, the assets of each business would be separate from the other, as also would the creditors.

In my judgment, the principles regulating cases where testators authorise the use of the whole or a part of the general estate in a business which is the subject of a specific disposition were rightly applied by BACON, C.J., to the circumstances which existed in Re Beale (1) and should be applied to the circumstances of the present case. It seems to me impossible to regard the appellant as a creditor of the bankrupt, as the person carrying on the business, in respect of the moneys which she advanced for the purpose of the riding academy, and, unless she was such a creditor, she cannot prove in competition with people who are. If she was, in fact, such a creditor, she could have sued the bankrupt for the return of her moneys at any time prior to his bankruptcy. Her evidence, however, shows how remote from reality any conception such as this would be. It shows that the enterprise into which her money went was intended to provide both him and her with a home and with a living and also, if it proved successful, possibly with an occupation for her daughter, and she admitted that no word was ever said with regard to repaying the sums which she advanced in furtherance of this enterprise from time to time. The truth of the matter is that the whole foundation of the argument of counsel for the appellant is undermined by the realisation that the moneys which she advanced did not constitute, and were never intended to constitute, a loan at all. They represented her contribution to the capital of a business enterprise in which she plainly had an interest herself, and, in my judgment, she is no more entitled, as against the ordinary creditors of the business, to prove in respect of her contribution than the proprietor is entitled to prove in respect of his. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the learned judge arrived at a right conclusion, and, in my judgment, accordingly, this appeal must fail.

As an alternative to the argument founded on Re Beale (1), counsel for the trustee advanced two further contentions. The first one was that the appellant represented to the world that she was the bankrupt's wife, and, as such, subject to the disability imposed by s. 36 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and she cannot now be heard, as against the bankrupt's creditors, to say that she is not so subject. The other contention was that, although the appellant was not, in fact, a partner of the bankrupt, she held herself out to be a partner, and for this reason also she cannot prove in the bankruptcy in competition with the general creditors of the business. Having regard to the view which I have expressed on the main point which was argued on the appeal and on which the learned county court judge himself based his decision, it is not necessary for me to express an opinion on these further contentions of the trustee and I refrain from doing so.

HARMAN, J.: I agree with the judgment just delivered and am of opinion that the rejection of the proof is clearly right when the true nature of the transaction between the appellant and the bankrupt is once appreciated. As ROMER, J., has said, this transaction was in fact an investment by the appellant of part of her capital in the business which the bankrupt was to carry on and did carry on for their joint benefit. The fact that she was not a partner or sharer directly in the profits is quite irrelevant. While the business was a going concern she could not and, indeed, would not, have attempted to withdraw her investment so as to bring down the venture. If that be so, it is clear that, whatever her rights against the bankrupt may be, she cannot compete with his creditors whose debts arose out of the failure of the very business in which her money was invested. I regard this result with satisfaction. Were the appellant right, it would follow that a mistress would be in a better position than a wife. On the facts of this case, though s. 36 (2) admittedly does not apply to the appellant, she is no better off than if it did.

Appeal dismissed.

M. & H. STEEL (a firm) v. COCKCROFT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Tucker, Singleton and Morris, L.JJ.), May 22, 1951.]

Rent Restriction—Termination of statutory tenancy—Substitution of contractual tenancy—Agreement that tenant should pay rates instead of landlord as theretofore—Corresponding decrease in rent.

In 1925 the tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied died, leaving a widow who remained in possession of the premises as statutory tenant and paid a rent which was inclusive of rates. On June 17, 1949, the landlords wrote to the widow notifying her that in future she must pay the rates direct to the rating authority as from June 30, 1949, and that a corresponding reduction would be made in the rent. The letter ended by stating: "If you remain [in the premises] after that date it will be assumed that you have agreed to the above [arrangement]." The widow continued to live in the premises and to pay the reduced rent until Feb. 12, 1950, when she died. On a claim by the landlords for possession, her son, who was living with her at the time of her death and continued to live in the house, contended that the effect of the letter of June 17, 1949, was to put an end to his mother's statutory tenancy and to create a new contractual tenancy so that he was entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts.

HELD: the fact that a tenant and a landlord agreed between themselves for their mutual convenience that the method of payment of rates should be varied did not as a matter of law necessarily destroy the statutory tenancy which had previously existed; there was nothing in the circumstances of the present case or in the contents of the letter which compelled the court to draw the inference that the parties intended to create a new, contractual tenancy; and, therefore, the landlords were entitled to possession.

APPEAL by the defendant from a decision of A. D. GERRARD, Esq., K.C., at the Salford Hundred Court of Record, dated Aug. 29, 1950, whereby he made an order for possession of premises to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied.

Bamber for the defendant.

T. M. Backhouse for the landlords.

LORD TUCKER: This is an appeal from a judgment of the judge of the Salford Hundred Court in which he gave possession to the landlords of certain premises known as 46, Winnie Street, Moston.

In November, 1916, the premises were let by the landlords to one Alfred Cockcroft who was the father of Reginald, the present defendant. From time to time notices of increase of rent were served on Alfred under the provisions of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 3 (2), with the result that he became the statutory tenant at a rent of about 10s. a week, the landlords paying the rates to the local authority. On Apr. 18, 1925, Alfred died, leaving behind him his widow, Amanda, who remained in possession of the premises and paid rent. It is conceded that under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 she was entitled to remain on at his death. On June 17, 1949, the landlords sent to her a letter on which the present case depends. It is in the form of a circular letter and was sent to a number of different tenants, some of whose tenancies varied from that of Amanda Cockcroft. It reads as follows:

"Dear Sir or Madam, As there has arisen from time to time some question as to the proper amount of rates to be included in the rent, we have decided in the interest of all concerned to allow tenants to pay their general rates direct to the rating authority. For which purpose, therefore, we shall advise the rates department to collect their own rates as from June 30, 1949, in the manner most convenient to both parties. Your rent will, accordingly, be reduced as from July 1 to 8s. 0d. per week made up as under: Standard rent, £18 17s. 0d.; less rates, 1914, £4 13s. 4d.; nett rent, £14 3s. 8d.; 40% nett rent, £5 13s. 4d.; plus water rate, 1949, 17s. 0d.; rent payable to us £20 14s. 0d. In order, therefore, legally to conform with the above, we beg to give you notice to terminate your tenancy on June 25, 1949. If you remain after that date it will be assumed that you have agreed to the above. M. & H. Steel."

After June 25, 1949, Amanda Cockcroft remained on in the premises and paid the new rent in accordance with that letter, and she paid her rates direct to the local authority as and when they became due. On Feb. 12, 1950, Amanda died intestate, and the defendant, who was living with her at the time of her death, being the sole beneficiary, took out letters of administration, and continued to live in the house.

The landlords contended that the widow, Amanda, died a statutory tenant, and that, on that basis, the son was not entitled to hold over as a statutory tenant under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. The defendant agreed that, if Amanda was a statutory tenant at the time of her death, he would not be entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, but he contended that the result of the letter of June 17, 1949, was to put an end to the statutory tenancy and to create a new contractual tenancy and thus he was entitled to remain in possession. The learned judge decided in favour of the landlords' contention, holding that there was nothing in the letter which I have read and the circumstances which existed at the relevant time from which the inference could properly be drawn that the parties were then intending to put an end to the statutory tenancy which had existed and to create a new, contractual tenancy.

Section 2 of the Act of 1920 deals with "Permitted increases in rent," and sub-s. (1) provides:

"The amount by which the increased rent of a dwelling-house to which this Act applies may exceed the standard rent shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as follows, that is to say . . . (b) An amount not exceeding any increase in the amount for the time being payable by the landlord in respect of rates over the corresponding amount paid in respect of the yearly, half-yearly or other period which included Aug. 3, 1914, or in the case of a dwelling-house for which no rates were payable in respect of any period which included the said date, the period which included the date on which the rates first became payable thereafter."

Section 2 (3) provides:

"Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an alteration of rent, and where, as the result of such a transfer, the terms on which a dwelling-house is held are on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, the rent shall be deemed to be increased, whether or not the sum periodically payable by way of rent is increased, and any increase of rent in respect of any transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant where, as the result of such transfer, the terms on which any dwelling-house is held are on the whole not less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, shall be deemed not to be an increase of rent for the purposes of this Act: Provided that, for the purposes of this section, the rent shall not be deemed to be increased where the liability for rates is transferred from the landlord to the tenant, if a corresponding reduction is made in the rent."

In the present case it is admitted that a corresponding reduction was made in the rent, so that the transfer could not be deemed to amount to an increase in rent for the purposes of this sub-section.

The argument for the defendant is that, by remaining silent on receipt of this letter and continuing in possession of the premises, the widow accepted the terms set out in the letter, and this resulted in the creation of a new tenancy at a different rent from that in the original contract between the original parties to this tenancy. It is to be observed that the penultimate sentence of this letter: "In order, therefore, legally to conform with the above, we beg to give you notice to terminate your tenancy on June 25, 1949," in the circumstances of this case, is surplusage because the widow was already a statutory tenant and there was no need to terminate her tenancy. The mere insertion of a paragraph purporting to terminate a tenancy which has already been terminated cannot convert it into a contractual tenancy, but the words on which the defendant primarily relies are: "If you remain after that date it will be assumed that you have agreed to the above."

The question is whether the fact that a tenant and a landlord agree between themselves for their mutual convenience that the method of payment of rates shall be varied of itself as a matter of law necessarily destroys the statutory tenancy which was previously in existence (and which in the present case had been in existence for nearly twenty-five years) and creates a new contractual tenancy. The learned judge held that it did not, and I am of the same opinion. When one looks at s. 2, and, particularly, at the proviso to s. 2 (3), it is clear that it is implicit in the section that the legislature is contemplating that that which was done in the present case can be done without amounting to a contravention of the provisions of the Act. The court is not compelled to draw the inference that when the parties have taken advantage of a provision of this kind they must as a matter of law be held to be intending to do that which, in my view, they manifestly were not intending to do, namely, to put an end to the nature of the relationship between them which had existed over this long period and create a new contractual tenancy. The statute indicates that parties may properly make an arrangement of this kind for a different method of payment of rates—a mere matter of machinery—providing always that the proper corresponding reduction is made in the rent. That was done in the present case and

I agree with the learned judge in the view he formed that there is nothing in the circumstances of the case or in the contents of the letter which compels the court to draw the inference that the parties intended to create a new contractual tenancy. For these reasons I think the appeal fails.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I am of the same opinion.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

NOTE.HIGHAM v. HAVANT AND WATERLOO URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Singleton and Morris, L.JJ.), June 4, 5, 1951.]

Town and Country Planning—Compulsory acquisition—Compensation—Possibility of service of enforcement notice—Notice to treat served after the passing of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and before the “appointed day” —Planning permission—Caravan site—Licence under Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 269 (1)—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 75 (1).

Appeal by the claimant from a decision of the Divisional Court (LORD GODDARD, C.J., HILBERY and PARKER, JJ.), dated Dec. 14, 1950, and reported [1951] 1 All E.R. 173, on a Case stated by an arbitrator under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, s. 6 (1).

The claimant owned two sites which she had purchased in plots at dates prior to Apr. 16, 1931, and Aug. 27, 1936, respectively, and, except during the war, had used the whole of one site and part of the other as caravan sites. On Dec. 4, 1937, she applied for and acquired a licence under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 269, to use the land for caravans. No town planning scheme had been prepared for the area in which the sites were situated, but on Dec. 7, 1928, the Minister of Health confirmed a resolution to prepare a scheme passed by the then local planning authority, the interim development order applicable at that time being the Portsmouth and District Town Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1928. No application for consent to the user of the sites for caravans under the Town and Country Planning Acts had been made or granted. By the Havant and Waterloo Urban District Council Act, 1947, power was given to the relevant local authority to acquire (inter alia) the two sites in question, and on June 17, 1948, notices to treat were served on the claimant. The compensation fell to be assessed under Part V of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (in particular, s. 55 thereof), which was passed on Aug. 6, 1947, Part V coming into force immediately. The remainder of the Act, including s. 75 (which deals with the position where existing development contravenes previous planning control), by virtue of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (Appointed Day) Order, 1948, dated Feb. 9, 1948, came into force on July 1, 1948. In the assessment of compensation to be paid to the claimant the question arose whether on or after July 1, 1948, the actual use of the two sites could be the subject of an enforcement notice under s. 75 of the Act of 1947, and, if so, whether the arbitrator might take that into account in assessing compensation.

The Divisional Court held that (i) the grant of a licence under s. 269 of the Act of 1936, even though it was granted by the local authority which was also the planning authority, did not amount to planning permission, and, therefore, as no permission for the use of the land for caravan sites had been given by or under the interim development order, having regard to s. 75 (9) of the Act of 1947 the claimant's use of the land was begun in breach of previous planning control; (ii) on the true construction of s. 75 (1) of the Act of 1947 (which applies Part III of the Act with regard to enforcement notices, including, in particular, s. 23, and provides that an enforcement notice shall not be served in respect of any use at any time after three years from the appointed day), that sub-section provided a substituted, and not an additional, limitation to that provided by s. 23 (which imposes a limitation of four years from the beginning of the change of user), and, therefore, an enforcement notice served when s. 75 came into force would not be out of time; (iii) it could not be implied, having regard to s. 75 (6), that where no enforcement notice had been served the arbitrator could not take into consideration the possibility of its being served; although at the date of the notices to treat s. 75 had not become law, it was then known that the section would come into force on July 1, 1948, and that an enforcement notice could then be served; and, therefore, the arbitrator was not debarred from taking into consideration the possibility of such service.

KOHNKE v. KARGER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lynskey, J.), May 2, 3, 4, 7, 22, 1951.]

Estoppel—Estoppel by record—Judgment of foreign court—Separate causes of action against different defendants, but in respect of same damage—Action for damages for negligence—Plaintiff injured in motor car collision in France—Claim brought against French driver in penal proceedings in France—Damages recovered against French driver, but insufficient to compensate plaintiff—Action in High Court against English driver.

While travelling in France in a motor car driven by the defendant, the plaintiff was injured in a collision between the defendant's car and a motor lorry driven by a Frenchman. In penal proceedings in France against the lorry driver for involuntarily causing, by negligence, personal injuries to the plaintiff, the driver was held two-thirds responsible for the accident and the defendant was held one-third liable, and the plaintiff was awarded £1,428 damages in respect of her injuries. That judgment was satisfied. While the French proceedings were pending the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant (who resided in England) in the High Court, claiming damages for personal injuries and loss caused or contributed to by his negligence. The defendant contended that she was not entitled to recover damages against him as she had already obtained a satisfied judgment of a competent court in respect of the damage suffered by her. The plaintiff contended that in the penal proceedings in France she had not been able to recover full compensation for the damage suffered by her as (a) in those proceedings she was not able to claim for damage to or loss of goods, and (b) no damages were awarded in respect of any subsequent aggravation of her injuries. She undertook to give credit to the defendant for the damages awarded to her in the French proceedings.

HELD: the plaintiff was entitled to bring her claim against the lorry driver in France and against the defendant in England, and the fact that she had obtained a satisfied judgment in France against the lorry driver did not prevent her from obtaining damages against the defendant except to the extent that she had received compensation from the lorry driver in respect of the same damage; as the principles on which damages were assessed were different in the French and the English courts and the award of the French court was less than what an English court would have regarded as full satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim for the injuries and loss suffered by her, the court was not bound by the French court's assessment of the damages; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant the balance in respect of the damage which she had suffered.

ACTION for damages for personal injuries and loss arising out of the negligence of the defendant.

On July 20, 1948, while spending a holiday in France, the plaintiff was seriously injured in a collision between the motor car in which she was travelling, and which was driven by the defendant, and a motor lorry driven by a Frenchman, M. Mahieu. Under French law negligence causing personal injury is a punishable offence and also gives rise to a claim for damages, and by the procedure of the French courts injured persons may claim in the criminal proceedings for damages for personal injuries which they have suffered, but not for damage to or loss of goods. If proceedings were brought in a civil court against the same defendant in respect of the same damage, the claim would be met by a plea of res judicata, but, if there were subsequent aggravation of the injuries, a plaintiff might recover in the civil courts further compensation in respect of the aggravation, and in such proceedings the civil judge was not bound by the assessment of damages by the correctional court although in practice he accepted the award in respect of the injuries known at the time of the hearing by the correctional court. On Feb. 11, 1949, a correctional court found the lorry driver guilty of causing, by negligence, the personal injuries to the plaintiff, and, in dealing with her civil claims, held that the accident was attributable as to three-fourths to the lorry driver and as to one-fourth to the defendant. On an appeal by the lorry driver and his employers, the Court of Appeal in Paris apportioned the responsibility for the accident as to two-thirds to the lorry driver and as to one-third to the defendant. Damages amounting to £1,428 (1,400,000 francs) were awarded to the plaintiff against the lorry driver and his employers, and the whole of this sum had been received by the plaintiff on Feb. 10, 1951, the defendant later reimbursing to the lorry driver one-third of these damages. On Dec. 7, 1949, the plaintiff commenced an action in the High Court in England against the defendant, who resided in England, claiming damages for personal injuries and loss caused or contributed to by his negligence. The defendant contended inter alia that, as the plaintiff had taken proceedings in France against the lorry driver and had obtained judgment against him in respect of the damage suffered by her and the judgment had been satisfied, she could not claim a second time in respect of the same damage even though the claim was against an independent wrongdoer, and, therefore, she could not recover damages in the present action against the defendant. The plaintiff contended that the damages recovered in the French proceedings did not cover the whole of the damage which she had suffered, but she undertook to give credit to the defendant for the amount recovered by her in the French proceedings.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 22. LYNSKEY, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the defendant did not here suggest that he could rely on a plea of res judicata. His submission was: Where one damnum is caused by separate injuria for which two or more persons are responsible a satisfied judgment by a court of competent jurisdiction for that damnum is a bar to any further action in respect of any injuria which caused that damnum, or, put more shortly, a satisfied judgment for a single damnum is a bar to another action for the same damnum based on any injuria causing that damnum. If a person suffers damage as a result of the independent wrongs of two others and recovers, whether as a result of a judgment or otherwise, in respect of the whole of his damage from one of them, then, apart from any question of subrogation, he could not claim in respect of any of that damage a second time from the other of the wrongdoers: see Bird v. Randall (1), Morris v. Robinson (2), per BAYLEY, J. (3 B. & C. 205) and United Australia, Ltd. v. Barclays Bank, Ltd. (3), per VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C. ([1940] 4 All E.R. 31). He cannot obtain double satisfaction. Where the judgment which is satisfied is that of a court of competent jurisdiction in this country and is in respect of the same damage, although resulting from different wrongs, the old courts of equity, and now the High Court exercising its equitable jurisdiction, would interfere to prevent such double satisfaction.

If, however, the court giving the judgment which is satisfied is a foreign court, the matter is not so clear. If a plaintiff has brought proceedings in a foreign court against a defendant for damages in respect of a cause of action and obtains judgment and that judgment is satisfied, it appears on the authorities that he cannot proceed in respect of the same debt or damages based on the same cause of action against the same defendant in the courts of this country: see Barber v. Lamb (4) and Taylor v. Hollard (5). In Barber v. Lamb (4) ERLE, C.J., stated the principle (8 C.B.N.S. 100) as being

“ . . . that the plaintiff has obtained the judgment of a tribunal to which he has resorted for enforcing his debt, and that the judgment so obtained has been satisfied by payment of the sum awarded.”

KEATING, J., said (ibid., 101):

“ But the ground is, that there has been a judgment of a court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and that that judgment has been satisfied by payment.”

In Taylor v. Hollard (5) JELF, J., said ([1902] 1 K.B. 681):

“ . . . I think [the plaintiff] had elected to take the judgment of the foreign country to which he had appealed in discharge of the whole cause of action, and could not afterwards sue for the residue of the debt in England.”

He then quoted a passage from Barber v. Lamb (4), where ERLE, C.J., said (29 L.J.C.P. 236):

“ It would be contrary to all principle for the party who has chosen such tribunal, and got what was awarded, to seek a better judgment in respect of the same matter from another tribunal.”

Both Barber v. Lamb (4) and Taylor v. Hollard (5) were actions between the same parties for the same debt based on the same cause of action. The question which I have to consider is whether, where there are separate causes of action against different defendants for the same damage, a judgment obtained against one of them in a foreign court which has been satisfied is a bar to proceedings against the other for the same damnum in the courts of this country. If I was satisfied that the amount recovered in this case by the plaintiff from the lorry driver in France was sufficient to compensate her for the damage which she has suffered, the principle of the decision in Bird v. Randall (1) against double satisfaction would apply and the plaintiff's claim would be dismissed. If, however, as is the case, I am satisfied that the amount recovered by the plaintiff is not sufficient to compensate her for the damage from personal injuries which she has suffered, am I bound by the decision of the French court as to the assessment of the damages? So far as I am aware, and so far as counsel could find, there is no direct authority on this question. The decisions in Barber v. Lamb (4) and Taylor v. Hollard (5) both seem to rest on the principle that the plaintiff, having elected the tribunal to decide the claim against the defendant and obtained judgment from that tribunal and satisfaction of that judgment, is bound by his election of the tribunal to decide the issue between the parties. When, however, there are two causes of action against separate defendants, but founded on the same damage, a question arises whether there is anything to prevent the injured person choosing one tribunal to decide his claim against one defendant and another tribunal to decide his claim against the other defendant.

The plaintiff brought her claim against the lorry driver and his employers in France, in which country they resided and where their assets were, and she brought her claim against the defendant in this country, where he resides and where, no doubt, his assets are. In my view, there is nothing in principle which prevents her adopting this course, and her election of one tribunal to deal with her claim against the lorry driver and his employers, even when she obtains judgment which is satisfied, will not avail the defendant except to the extent that the damages to which she would be entitled have been in part satisfied by the money recovered from the lorry driver. This last statement is made on the assumption that I am not bound by the French court's assessment of damages and not bound to treat that assessment as correct. The principles on which damages are assessed differ in different countries, but in assessing damages I must apply the law and practice of these courts. I am satisfied on the evidence that, when the French courts assess damages in a claim grafted on penal proceedings for causing personal injuries by negligence, the claimant cannot recover for damage to property: e.g., in this case the claim by the plaintiff for the loss of her wrist watch could not be recovered in those proceedings, and this is conceded by the defendant. As a claim can subsequently be made for aggravation of injuries, the risk of such aggravation, presumably, is not taken into account in assessing the damages, whereas in this country damages are assessed once and for all. In the French courts, according to the evidence, the general damages vary according to the social position of the injured person; the better the social position the higher the general damages, and that, of course, apart from loss of earning capacity. In my view, it may well be, and in this case I think it is, that the award of the French court is less than what would be regarded here as full satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim for the injuries and loss which she sustained. I am of opinion that I am not bound by the assessment by the French court of the damages in the plaintiff's claim against the lorry driver and his employers in assessing the damages in the plaintiff's claim against the defendant. I am not called on to decide the question whether in these proceedings the plaintiff must give credit for the damages which she has received from the lorry driver, as she has always been ready to give such credit. If I had to decide it, I should have thought that, as the damages to which she was entitled had been pro tanto satisfied by what she had received from the lorry driver, her damages must be reduced by that amount in her claim against the defendant.

[His LORDSHIP then assessed the damages and gave judgment for the plaintiff for £835.]

T. v. B. (formerly T.) and B.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), May 28, 1951.]
Divorce—Collusion—Agreement for disposal of matrimonial property—Receipt by wife of reduced share in consideration of husband's foregoing right to claim damages against co-respondent—Claim for damages subsequently included in petition—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 4 (2) (c).

A By their answers to a husband's petition for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent the wife and the co-respondent alleged that the husband was guilty of collusion. The substance of the particulars in support of that allegation was that, on becoming aware of the wife's adultery, the husband began negotiations with her for the disposal of the matrimonial property; that a sum was agreed as the wife's share; and that, in consideration of the husband's foregoing any right to claim damages against the co-respondent, the wife consented to accept a sum which was less than her agreed share of the matrimonial property. It was further alleged that that agreement was carried into effect and that a sum representing the wife's share less the amount deducted in respect of the husband's foregoing the claim for damages was paid by the husband to the wife before the institution of the divorce proceedings, but when the petition was filed it contained a claim for damages against the co-respondent. On an application by the husband to strike out the allegation of collusion in the answers with the particulars thereunder as disclosing no reasonable answer to the petition,

D HELD: although, by including in his petition a claim for damages against the co-respondent, the husband had not carried out one part of the agreement, he had obtained the benefit of the other part by paying to the wife a reduced share of the matrimonial property; if the agreement were collusive, it remained collusive notwithstanding that the husband had broken one of its terms; so long as he had not purged himself by paying back what he had received, the allegation that the proceedings were subject to a collusive bargain between the parties providing for the conduct of the suit in relation to the measure of damages raised a matter which the court had a duty to investigate, and, as such, disclosed a reasonable answer to the petition; and, therefore, the allegations in the answers would not be struck out.

G APPEAL by the husband from an order of Mr. Registrar COMPTON-MILLER, made on Apr. 27, 1951, whereby he refused to strike out paragraphs, together with the particulars thereunder, contained in the answers of the wife and the co-respondent to the husband's petition for divorce on the ground of adultery.

Picard for the husband.

H Friend for the wife and the co-respondent.

WILLMER, J.: This is an appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar COMPTON-MILLER, made on Apr. 27, 1951, by which the learned registrar refused to strike out a paragraph (together with the particulars thereunder) contained in the answers of the wife and the co-respondent to the husband's petition for divorce on the ground of adultery. The husband now appeals against that order, and, in pursuance of the powers conferred by R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, asks me to say that the learned registrar was wrong and that that paragraph in the answers of the wife and the co-respondent should be struck out on the ground that it discloses no reasonable answer to the petition.

The particulars objected to are lengthy and I do not propose to read them all. The allegation to which the particulars are directed is to the effect that the husband is guilty of collusion, and the substance of the particulars in support of that allegation is that, on the husband becoming aware of the wife's adultery, he began to negotiate with her for the disposal of the matrimonial property. A It is alleged that a certain sum was arrived at as being appropriate to be the wife's share of the matrimonial property. It is further alleged that in the course of the negotiations an agreement was arrived at whereby, in consideration of the husband foregoing any right to claim damages against the co-respondent in the proceedings, he would pay to the wife less than he would otherwise have had to pay as her share of the matrimonial property. B It is alleged that that agreement was carried into effect, and that the net sum so agreed on—i.e., the wife's share less the price of foregoing the claim for damages—was paid by the husband to the wife before the institution of the present proceedings. C It is to be noted that, whether or not it is true that that agreement was made, the husband has included in his petition a claim for damages against the co-respondent. I am not concerned with the merits of the allegations now made by the wife and the co-respondent. It is conceded that for the purposes of the present application I must assume that those allegations are capable of proof. D The question is not whether they are meritorious, but whether, assuming their truth, they are relevant to the matters in issue between the parties. Only if they disclose no reasonable answer to the petition can an order be made that they be struck out in limine so as to debar the wife and the co-respondent by order of the court from bringing them forward at the trial.

The matter is put by counsel for the husband in this way. He says that it is not a material averment to say that the husband is guilty of collusion. If one looks at the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 4 (2) (c), (and be it remarked in parenthesis that so far as this point is concerned the Act of 1950 corresponds with what the law has been ever since 1857) it appears that it is only where the court is not satisfied on the evidence that "the petition is not presented or prosecuted in collusion with the respondent" that collusion is an answer E to the petition, or, indeed, becomes a material question at all. Here it is not in terms alleged that the petition is presented or prosecuted in collusion with the wife or with the co-respondent; the paragraph objected to merely says F that the husband is guilty of collusion. In reply to a suggestion that that matter is one that could be cured by amendment, counsel for the husband replies that, if the paragraph were amended so as to follow the wording of the subsection, the particulars delivered would not support the allegation in its amended form. G All that is alleged in the particulars is that there was at some time previous to the institution of the proceedings a bargain between the parties which might have been a collusive bargain, but, bearing in mind that the present petition was launched, not in pursuance of any such bargain, but, on the contrary, in breach of it, if any such bargain did exist, it cannot be alleged, H having regard to the particulars given, that the petition is presented or prosecuted in collusion with the wife or the co-respondent so as to bring it within the wording of s. 4 (2) (c) of the Act of 1950. Counsel for the husband points out quite correctly that in most of the cases which are cited as authorities on the question of collusion it has been recognised that collusion is not necessarily a permanent obstacle in the way of a petitioner obtaining relief, that is to say, it is always open to a petitioner, if he has been guilty of collusion, to purge his collusion and then bring proceedings which are not tainted therewith. What has usually been said is that the collusive suit must be discontinued or got rid of first, and then a fresh suit, not tainted with collusion, can properly be instituted. Here, however, it is said on behalf of the husband that he has already purged any collusion to which he may have been a party by not bringing any suit in pursuance of the alleged collusive bargain, but by bringing this suit in flat defiance of it. In those circumstances it is contended for the husband that the allegation is not only bad in form, as not bringing the matter within the four walls of the sub-section, but that it is also bad in substance because the facts alleged do not support the suggestion that the petition is presented or prosecuted in collusion with the wife, and, therefore, the facts alleged are not such as would in any case require the court to refuse relief and do not disclose any reasonable answer to the petition.

The argument on behalf of the wife and the co-respondent is that this complaint on the part of the husband is based on a complete misunderstanding of what the wife and the co-respondent are trying to allege. Counsel for the wife and the co-respondent has referred to Churchward v. Churchward and Holliday (1), and I think it is right that I should refer to what was said by SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in that case, because this, as I understood counsel, is really the corner-stone of his argument. The learned President said ([1895] P. 30):

“ . . . if the initiation of a suit be procured, and its conduct (especially if abstention from defence be a term) provided for by agreement, that constitutes collusion . . . ”

That, in the submission of the wife and the co-respondent, is exactly what has happened here. This is a case in which the conduct of the suit has been provided for by agreement—that is to say, before the launching of the petition there was a bargain as to a most material part of the suit, namely, the measure of damages which the co-respondent ought to be required to pay. That bargain constituted an attempt on the part of the parties to oust the jurisdiction of the court with regard to the award of damages, and, still more, objection is taken to the fact that that bargain seeks to prevent the court from retaining control over any money paid by way of damages as between the co-respondent and the husband. In such circumstances it is contended that the bargain is one which tends to pervert the course of justice, to use a phrase which has been used in more than one case in relation to collusion, I think most recently by myself in Lowndes v. Lowndes (2) ([1950] 1 All E.R. 1005). The alleged bargain, it is pointed out on behalf of the wife and the co-respondent, has two sides to it. First of all it provides for the damages which are to be paid by the co-respondent in respect of his adultery with the wife. In that respect reliance is placed on the fact, as is alleged, that that part of the bargain was carried out, because the agreed damages were paid in the sense that they were taken into account in paying the wife her share of the matrimonial property. The other side of the bargain was that, in consideration of the damages so paid or deemed to be paid in advance, the husband should include no claim for damages against the co-respondent in the petition which he was proposing to launch. The fact that the husband has violated that alleged term of the agreement has not, in the submission of the wife and the co-respondent, any relevance. The agreement made and in part executed before trial remains a collusive agreement notwithstanding that the husband has broken one of its terms.

The point which is taken by counsel for the wife and the co-respondent—and, in my judgment, well taken—is that, if any such agreement was made, and if it is true, as I must assume it to be true for the present purpose, that the damages were paid in the sense of being taken into account in the amount paid to the wife, it is no longer competent for the husband to purge himself of the taint of collusion except by restoring the status quo, i.e., by paying back what he has received, albeit indirectly, in pursuance of the agreement. It is said that, if he were to do that and thereby were to restore the position to what it was before there had been any discussion about finance in relation to the present petition, he could clearly say that, notwithstanding his having been a party to a collusive agreement, he had washed his hands of it, and proceedings could then be instituted free from any taint of collusion, but so long as he retains the benefit of the agreement, as it is alleged that he does, it cannot be said that the present suit is not the subject of an agreement which provides for its conduct. If that is so, that is an allegation which brings the present suit directly within the sub-section as interpreted in Churchward v. Churchward and Holliday (1) and raises a matter which it would be the duty of the court to investigate. As such, it discloses a reasonable answer to the petition, and, accordingly, it is said that it would be wrong to order that this allegation and the particulars thereunder be struck out.

I have come to the conclusion that the argument for the wife and the co-respondent is well founded. It appears to me that, when properly understood, the wife's allegation is really that the present suit is presented in collusion with her and the co-respondent, in the sense that a collusive bargain was struck between the parties providing for the conduct of the suit in relation to the matters of which particulars are given. Had the matter been pleaded in that way in the first instance I do not know whether the present application would ever have been made. It may be that the husband would still have said just the same, namely, that the particulars given do not support the allegation made. That, however, seems to me to go only to the costs of this application. I regard this pleading as being defective in form in that it does not in terms bring the wife and the co-respondent within the wording of s. 4 (2) (c) of the Act of 1950. If they desire to raise the question of collusion on the lines indicated in the argument before me, it seems to me that their answers should be amended so as to bring them within the wording of the sub-section. The defect in the pleading is, however, a matter which goes to the form and not to the substance, and it seems to me it is clearly curable by an amendment of the sort I have already referred to in the course of the argument and in this judgment. The order that I shall, therefore, make is that the application to strike out this paragraph of the answer in each case fails, but I direct that the paragraph and the particulars thereunder be amended.

Appeal dismissed.

KEANE v. CLARKE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Eversherd, M.R., Denning, L.J., and Roxburgh, J.), May 24, 1951.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Proof—Recovery of over-paid rent—No evidence of letting on or before Sept. 1, 1939—Evidence of letting in 1944—Prima facie evidence of standard rent—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (a) and s. 14 (1) (as amended by Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (1), sched. I).

In 1949 the landlord let to the tenant premises to which the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, applied, at a weekly rent of 35s. In an action for the recovery of rent over-paid the tenant proved that in 1944 the premises were let at a weekly rent of 22s. 6d. and that subsequently there was a permitted increase of 1s. Neither party adduced any evidence as to a previous letting of the premises.

HELD: in the absence of evidence regarding the letting of the premises on or before Sept. 1, 1939, by proving the terms of the letting in 1944 the tenant had established a prima facie case that 22s. 6d. was the standard rent of the premises, and, in the absence of evidence by the landlord to displace that prima facie case, the tenant was entitled to succeed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of His Honour JUDGE DONE, sitting at Clerkenwell County Court, dated Jan. 30, 1951, dismissing her claim against the landlord for the repayment of over-paid rent for premises to which the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, applied, on the ground that she had not discharged the onus of proof regarding the standard rent. The plaintiff proved that the premises were let in 1944, but neither side adduced evidence as to the rent on Sept. 1, 1939, or as to the date on which the premises were first let. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.

B. Lewis for the plaintiff.

N. N. McKinnon for the landlord.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: In this action the plaintiff sued the landlord for an alleged over-payment of rent which had been made by her to the landlord whose tenant she had formerly been. The plaintiff went into possession of the premises, which consist of a flat known as No. 11 Park Avenue, North Hornsey, in November, 1949. The rent was 35s. a week. She left the premises in October, 1950. By virtue of the provisions of s. 8 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, as amended by s. 7 (6) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, she is entitled in respect of that period to claim repayment of any sums charged to her in excess of the standard rent of the premises plus any permissible increases. The plaintiff must satisfy the court that she has, in truth, been over-charged, and the landlord admits that on May 27, 1944, these premises had been let to one Woods at a rent of 22s. 6d. per week. It was also established that Woods was succeeded as tenant by a Mrs. Urry, the mother-in-law of the then owner of the premises, one Williams, from whom the landlord acquired them. In cross-examination the landlord said:

"I bought with one tenant (i.e., Mrs. Urry). She had first floor big front, medium kitchen, medium back bedroom, and use of bath, w.c. and coal cellar. She had same accommodation as plaintiff at rent of £1 3s. 6d., including 1s. increase of rates. When I let same accommodation to plaintiff I increased rent to 35s. I did that to enable me to meet my commitments. I know nothing of the previous history."

It is, therefore, clear that the landlord—I do not suggest he was guilty of anything dishonest—took the opportunity on the change of tenancy to increase the rent to a figure which he did not purport to base on any knowledge which he had about the previous history of the premises, and, in particular, about the standard rent, though, of course, there is a statutory obligation laid on landlords to charge only the rent which the statute permits. It is clear that there was no evidence of any letting of the premises at any time before the letting to Woods on May 27, 1944.

Counsel on both sides have conceded that this flat is what is known as a "1939 dwelling-house," and, therefore, the standard rent is defined as being the rent at which the premises were let on Sept. 1, 1939, or, if not then let, the rent at which they were last let before that date or that at which they were first let after that date. Counsel for the landlord pointed out that in an action for recovery of over-paid rent it is for the plaintiff to establish to the satisfaction of the court that the rent which he paid was in excess of the rent which the landlord could legitimately charge and to do that he must bring evidence before the court from which the court can properly infer what was the rent legitimately chargeable. The county court judge clearly took the view that a plaintiff who was only able to prove a letting of the premises in suit at a date after September, 1939, and could not prove whether the premises were let on Sept. 1, 1939, or were let before that date, necessarily failed to make good the claim. He said:

"I held that the onus was on the plaintiff to prove that she had paid rent in excess of the standard rent, and that, as she had failed to call evidence sufficient to enable the court to determine the standard rent, she had not discharged that onus."

With great respect to the learned judge, I think he imposed too grave a burden on the plaintiff in such a case as this. In all matters of evidence each case must depend on the materials put before the court. There was here evidence of the letting to Woods in May, 1944; there was evidence that the rent he paid, plus the 1s. increase in respect of rates, continued until the plaintiff went into occupation in 1949, when the landlord raised it by 11s. 6d. It is true that there was no evidence called by the plaintiff regarding any letting previous to that to Woods. The judge seems to have thought that it was for the plaintiff to have produced as a witness the former landlord, Mr. Williams. That seems to me altogether too severe a burden on a plaintiff in cases of this kind. On the other hand, the landlord, by his particulars—I do not suggest they conclusively bind him—inferentially stated that the standard rent before the addition which he made was 22s. 6d. and no more.

What then, I ask myself, is the proper inference which the court should draw from the materials laid before it? I think the proper inference is that the standard rent of these premises was 22s. 6d., but I think also that the permissible rent should be treated as 23s. 6d. It seems to me that, in the absence of any evidence of previous lettings, the letting to Woods should be treated as the first letting of these premises and that the figure at which the premises were let to Woods should be treated as the then permissible, or the standard, rent. In taking that view I find some support from the decisions which have been cited by counsel for the plaintiff. I propose to refer to two of them—Veale v. Cabezas (1) and Bolger v. Daly (2). In Veale v. Cabezas (1) two points arose. The first was whether for the purpose of assessing the standard rent it was permissible to take the sum of the rents at which portions of the premises had been let at the material date or whether it was necessary to look to the first letting of the premises as a whole. To that question the answer was in favour of the second alternative. We are not concerned with that point in this case. In addition, a point was taken that there was no evidence to show that any rent had been charged in respect of the premises on or before the relevant date, Aug. 3, 1914, the only evidence being the letting to the defendant at a date very much later. As regards that latter point, the Divisional Court (HORRIDGE and SHEARMAN, JJ.) said this ([1921] W.N. 312):

“As to the period before Aug. 3, 1914, there was no evidence that the house had been let before that date at any rent other than the ground rent. The house was first let after that date to the defendant at the rent of £1 3s. a week, and that in the circumstances was therefore the ‘standard rent.’”

That is, at any rate, some support for the view that when there is no evidence of previous lettings an inference can be drawn as to the figure of the standard rent from evidence of a later letting. That case is not binding on this court, but it has stood unchallenged for a generation, and in these Rent Act matters many persons may well have regulated their affairs in accordance with that decision. Unless, therefore, I felt clearly disinclined to accept it, I should be very much against casting doubt on it at this date.

Bolger v. Daly (2), equally, does not bind us, but the point raised was of a similar character, and in the course of the leading judgment in the Supreme Court KENNEDY, C.J., said ([1925] 2 Ir. R. 46):

“The application of the Act depends on whether the standard rent or the valuation is within the maximum limit prescribed by the statute in defining the premises to which it applies. No evidence as to valuation is before this court, nor was any such evidence given before JOHNSTON, J.; and the case is, therefore, further narrowed down to a question as to whether there is evidence that the standard rent was such as to bring the premises within the Act. The letting to the defendant was proved. Under that letting he was given vacant possession on Nov. 1, 1918, and he was to hold from that date at a rent of £50 a year. If that figure represent the standard rent, the tenancy was within the Act. No evidence as to any previous letting of the premises having ever been made was given on the part of either party. It was contended on the part of the plaintiff that the onus was upon the defendant of showing whether or not the premises were let on Aug. 3, 1914, and, if not then let, when they were first let after that date, and whether such letting was at a rent within the prescribed limits of application of the statute, and, if so, what was the amount of the standard rent according to the definition in the statute. Now, on the evidence before the court in this case, we find a letting of the premises made on Nov. 1, 1918, which, no earlier letting having been proved, appears to be a first letting, and at a rent within the limits of application of the Act which gives us the statutory ‘standard rent.’ In my opinion, in that state of facts, the onus rested on the plaintiff to displace the prima facie case made by the defendant bringing the premises within the Act. No attempt has been made by the plaintiff to displace that prima facie case. We must, therefore, assume that the premises were let at a standard rent within the Act, namely, £50 a year, from which it follows that the decision of the learned judge at the trial cannot be sustained.”

I may say that the action was one in which the landlord sued the tenant for rent of a dwelling-house, and the tenant's defence was that the rent charged was in part irrecoverable.

I accept that reasoning and think it should be applied to the present case. I agree with counsel for the landlord that the onus in such an action as this lies in the first instance on the tenant, but I think that in the circumstances here the plaintiff has discharged it and established a prima facie case, and, to quote KENNEDY, C.J. (ibid.): "No attempt has been made by the [landlord] to displace that prima facie case." In those circumstances, I think the court must draw the inference that 22s. 6d. was the standard rent of these premises and that 23s. 6d. was the rent which the landlord was permitted to charge the plaintiff during the period of her tenancy. This appeal should be allowed, and the plaintiff should recover the difference between the rent that she paid, namely, 35s. a week, and the rent which she ought to have been charged, namely, 23s. 6d. a week, during the relevant period. A B

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. If the county court judge had had the authorities before him, he would have decided differently. Since 1938 it has been the duty of a landlord, in the case of a house within the Rent Restrictions Acts, to provide a rent book, and to insert in it a statement of what the standard rent is: see s. 6 of the Act of 1938. That shows that it is the duty of the landlord to find out what the standard rent is, and to tell it to the tenant. That is good sense, because the landlord is in a much better position to know it than is the tenant. The matter can be tested by asking this question. When the landlord issued a rent book to the plaintiff in November, 1949, what figure ought he to have inserted as the standard rent? He knew that he himself, since he bought the house, had been receiving 23s. 6d. rent. If he had made a few inquiries, he would have found that since May, 1944, the rent had been 22s. 6d., and had been increased by 1s. to 23s. 6d. on account of an increase in rates. On that information, what was the figure which he should have inserted in the rent book as the standard rent? There is only one answer possible, 22s. 6d. The contention of counsel for the landlord leads logically to the conclusion that the landlord could have inserted in the rent book any figure he chose as the standard rent, for it is argued that, because there is no evidence of the rent at which the house was let in 1939, it is impossible to say that the 35s. is wrong. That is obviously untenable. On the evidence in this case the proper inference was that the standard rent is 22s. 6d. unless the landlord could prove it was some other figure, and he did not prove it. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed. C D E F

BIGGIN & CO., LTD. AND ANOTHER v. PERMANITE, LTD.
BERRY WIGGINS & CO., LTD., THIRD PARTIES.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Singleton and Birkett, L.JJ.), April 19, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 1951.]

Damages—Measure of damages—Foreseeable consequence of breach of contract—Series of contracts—Plaintiffs compromising claim by ultimate purchaser—Liability of original vendor to plaintiffs.

In February, 1945, the Royal Netherlands government asked the plaintiffs to supply an adhesive for use with certain roofing felt. The plaintiffs passed the inquiry to the defendants, who ordered the material from the third parties. Deliveries of the material, which was called Permasec, began in April, 1945, and in the winter of 1945 substantial amounts were applied by contractors to whom it was supplied by the Dutch government. In April, 1946, the Permasec which had been applied began to drip and run, or "creep," and claims were made on the government. The government asked the plaintiffs and the defendants to take back 1,400 tons of Permasec which had not been used, but they refused. Subsequently, the government having withheld payment of £55,000 due to the plaintiffs, it was arranged to refer to arbitration the question of the plaintiffs' liability to the government, but, on the first day of the hearing, the plaintiffs settled the dispute by accepting liability to the extent of £43,000 and costs. The plaintiffs claimed those amounts from the defendants, together with the plaintiffs' own costs of the arbitration, and the defendants made similar claims against the third parties. It having been held that the defendants were in breach of their contract with the plaintiffs and that the third parties were in breach of their contract with the defendants, on the question of the measure of the damages, HELD: although the amount paid by the plaintiffs in settlement of the claim of the Dutch government was not conclusive of the extent of the defendants' liability to the plaintiffs and although it was the upper limit of that liability, if, having regard to the facts and on the evidence, the amount was reasonable, it should be taken as the measure of damages; on the facts and evidence, including the fact that the settlement had been made on legal advice, the settlement was reasonable; and, therefore, the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs in £43,000 and costs.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs against an order of DEVLIN, J., dated July 28, 1950, reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 859.

The plaintiffs, Biggin & Co., Ltd., and Archibald Bathgate (Building Materials), Ltd., two associated firms, in 1945 were asked to supply the Royal Netherlands government with large quantities of an adhesive for use with roofing felt. The plaintiffs passed the inquiry to the defendants, for whom the third parties manufactured the required material. The Royal Netherlands government re-sold the adhesive to various contractors, who, when it was found to be unsatisfactory, made claims for compensation on the government. The government in turn claimed against the plaintiffs, who settled the claim against them by the payment of £43,000 and certain costs and now claimed damages against the defendants. The defendants claimed to be indemnified by the third parties.

DEVLIN, J., held that the defendants were in breach of certain conditions of their contract with the plaintiffs and that the third parties were in breach of their contract with the defendants. The learned judge rejected, as the measure of the defendants' liability, the amount paid by the plaintiffs to the government, and on this question the plaintiffs appealed. The third parties did not appeal.

Beyfus, K.C., and Stenham for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Monckton, K.C., Karmel, K.C., and Beddington for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: Early in 1945, the Royal Netherlands government (which I will call "the Dutch government") were ordering material, among other things, for building, with a view no doubt to the reconstruction which would be necessary when Holland was liberated. They had in this country an agency which was called N.O.R.R., and was managed by a Mr. Kraayvanger. The Dutch government had, previous to the contracts which give rise to this case, bought some felt for building from the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs had obtained that felt from the defendants. Nothing turns on that contract, except that at the time when troubles arose the Dutch government owed the plaintiffs £55,000 in respect of felt which had been delivered. The relevance of that will appear later.

This case concerns contracts for what is called non-bituminous adhesive mastic, and its use, or its main use, is for sticking felt on to roofs made of wood or concrete. Some mastic or adhesive material is made of bitumen and some of pitch. The plaintiffs were not able to get mastic made of bitumen, or it was not available because bitumen could not be exported. So the material in question here had, as its base, pitch. There are also two sorts of mastic. One is applied hot, and the other is applied cold, or at any rate more or less cold, and the Dutch government wanted adhesive material which could be applied cold, because there was a great shortage of fuel. The contract was concluded for this material between the Dutch government and the plaintiffs, and between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The plaintiffs thought, until a comparatively late date, that the defendants were the manufacturers. They were not in fact the manufacturers. They had themselves contracted with the third parties in these proceedings, Berry Wiggins & Co., Ltd., who actually made the material. All concerned contemplated the sale to the Dutch government, and the commodity was being passed from the third parties to the defendants, the defendants to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs to the Dutch government for use in Holland. There were two contracts which covered 2,500 tons, and deliveries were made in the latter part of 1945 and early 1946. The material, when finally made, was called "Permasec" in Holland, and I will refer to it by that name.

The Permasec was not, as the learned judge found, in accordance with the contract. Its main defect was that, after it had been applied, the heat of the sun caused it to creep and drip through any orifice there was. The Dutch government claimed damages as against the plaintiffs in respect of what they alleged to be breaches of contract. They claimed to withhold the £55,000 on the ground that the damages which they had suffered in respect of the Permasec exceeded that amount. They agreed to submit the dispute as between themselves and the plaintiffs to arbitration. In the statement of claim, after setting out the contract and the alleged defects, para. 12 (d) says:

A "After inspection of the documents disclosed by the Dutch government in the said arbitration it became apparent to Biggins and their advisers that it would be virtually impossible successfully to resist the claim of the Dutch government and accordingly a compromise was arrived at and Biggins consented to a final award in favour of themselves for £55,083 4s. 11*d.* on their claim [for the felt] and in favour of the Dutch government for £43,000 with the costs of the arbitration including the costs of the award to be taxed if not agreed on the claim of the Dutch government for damages. The said compromise was reasonable."

B The next paragraph says:

"In the premises the damages recoverable from the defendants include the said sum of £43,000, the costs payable to the Dutch government, the defendants' own costs of the arbitration as between solicitor and own client, and interest."

C The learned judge allowed an amendment to the statement of claim, and in para. 12 (g) the plaintiffs claimed damages in this way:

"Alternatively the plaintiffs reasonably incurred costs and became liable for costs of the Dutch government in disputing the claim of the Dutch government as to liability for breach of contract, have lost interest as afore-said, and were liable to pay to the Dutch government damages in respect of breach of contract, as follows . . ."

D Then there are set out heads of damage which will have to be referred to more in detail later. The first, head A, is in respect of quantities of Permasec which were not sold, and the second, head B, in respect of damage sustained by the Dutch government in respect of the material which was sold and used and which dripped.

E The learned judge found for the plaintiffs on the issue of liability, and on that there is no appeal. He rejected the £43,000 as the measure of what the plaintiffs were entitled to claim from the defendants, although it was admitted that they could not recover more, apart from the costs. The costs were not disputed, and that item, therefore, passes out of the picture. He awarded £6,750 in respect of Permasec unsold (head A), and he directed an inquiry as to head B, the loss sustained by the Dutch government in respect of the 1,100 tons which were sold, subject to certain limitations. From that judgment the plaintiffs appeal. Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that £43,000 was a reasonable settlement and is the measure. On the question whether it was a reasonable sum, he submits that the learned judge was wrong in assessing only £6,750 for head A. He also submits that the limitations imposed on the inquiry (which would, it will be seen, limit the amount of the damages recoverable under that head) were also wrong.

F G If, of course, we came to the conclusion, as the learned judge did, that the £43,000 was not the measure and was to be disregarded, the arguments to which I have just referred would be equally applicable. The third parties were in a somewhat different position, and they do not appeal.

H The learned judge found that Permasec had three defects. The first I have referred to, viz., that in warm weather it crept and dripped, and this (in the learned judge's words) prevented it being properly described as an efficient adhesive. Secondly, he found that this material, when spread, had to be left an unduly long time before it became what is called "tacky." It appears clearly from the evidence that any adhesive applied cold or fairly cold has to be left a little time for preliminary drying off until it becomes sticky, and then you put the felt on, but, for reasons which emerge in the evidence, it becomes unsuitable if it has to be left too long—not, I think, necessarily unsuitable for every type of operation, but, as one of the witnesses said, when building is going on, there is usually a lot of dust about, and, if it has to be left too long, the dust gets on it and renders it useless. Ten to fifteen minutes might be all right, but this material, to get properly "tacky," had to be left thirty to sixty minutes. The third defect he found was that, on the description on the sale, it should have been suitable to be used with what is called bituminous felt. He found it was not suitable for that, being made of pitch.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to correspondence and other evidence, and continued:] The first problem is, in my opinion, whether the learned judge was right in rejecting the £43,000 altogether, treating it as irrelevant. I will read what he said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 865):

"Accordingly, I rule that the plaintiffs cannot prove their damages by reference to the settlement which they made with the Dutch government and that evidence relating to such a settlement is irrelevant and inadmissible. I must make it clear that no criticism has been made of the counsel and solicitors who unanimously advised the settlement, nor of the wisdom of their advice."

The plaintiffs' submission was that, if one can show that a settlement has been made under competent advice and one submits the advisers to cross-examination, that is enough. I do not accept that view, as will appear, but counsel for the plaintiffs put it in another way, and counsel for the defendants agreed that it was put in this way below. He said it was enough to call evidence which, though it may not strictly prove every item of your damage, shows that this was a reasonable settlement, having regard not to the wisdom of the advisers, but having regard to the evidence as called. There is no suggestion that the defendants did not contemplate the sale by the plaintiffs to the Dutch government, and the defendants do not dispute that the damages are to be assessed on the basis of liability to the Dutch government, subject, if necessary, to its being shown that some different term had been introduced or something of that sort. The only question, therefore, at the moment is: What is the effect of a settlement in these circumstances?

We were referred to the well-known case of Hammond & Co. v. Bussey (1). In that case the plaintiffs had been sued by a sub-vendee, and the defendant insisted, as here, that the goods were according to contract, and he refused, as it were, to take part in or be bound by the proceedings. The plaintiffs were sued by the sub-vendee, and damages were awarded against them. The defendant admitted his liability to pay those damages, so the case does not throw any light on what would have been the position if he had not. The argument took place as to the costs, and the court held that the plaintiffs could recover the costs they had had to pay in the proceedings. BOWEN, L.J., in his judgment, said (20 Q.B.D. 94):

"The defendant knew for what purpose the plaintiffs were purchasing the coal, viz., to re-sell it to the owners of steamers, and he must have known as a business man what damages might naturally result to the sub-vendees if it was not reasonably fit for the purposes of steamships, and therefore could not be used by the sub-vendees for such purposes. He may therefore be reasonably supposed to have contemplated, if the warranty were broken, that claims for damages would be made against the plaintiffs by the sub-vendees, and also, if he thought about it, he must have known that the plaintiffs, if such claims were made, would be in a position of difficulty: on the one side would be the sub-vendees who had tried the coal insisting that it was bad and incapable of being used as steam-coal, and that they had in consequence sustained damage; on the other side would be the defendant who knew more about the origin of the coal than the plaintiffs did, and who might refuse to be bound by any action they might take with regard to the sub-vendees' claims and assert that such action was unreasonable. What under such circumstances might the defendant be reasonably supposed to contemplate in the event of such a contingency happening? Obviously that the plaintiffs would come to their vendor in order to know how to deal with the claim, and that it would depend very much on what he said what course they would take, and whether they would defend the action or not. If the vendor said that the assertions of the sub-vendees with regard to the inferior quality of the coal were unfounded, the plaintiffs would naturally attach much weight to that; on the other hand, if he said that he had been imposed on by his vendors, naturally they would submit to the claims of their sub-vendees. What further could the defendant reasonably be supposed to contemplate? Why that, if under such circumstances he told the plaintiffs that, if they did not defend the action, it would be at their own responsibility and risk, and that the coal he sent was according to contract, the plaintiffs' only reasonable course would be to fight the action in order to thrash the question out; and then, of course, if the plaintiffs succeeded in their defence, there would be no occasion for their making any claim over; but if they failed the defendant must in reason be taken to have contemplated that they would have to pay damages and costs. All these matters I have mentioned seem to me to be matters that may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time they made the contract, and therefore the question whether the case comes within the second branch of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (2) seems to me to be answered, unless the argument of the defendant's counsel with regard to the construction of that rule is to be accepted."

Later in his judgment, he rejects the argument of the defendant's counsel.

We were also referred to Grébert-Borgnis v. Nugent (3). That was a similar case of a sub-vendee. The sub-vendee had been sued in a French court and was held liable to pay £28. The court held that the £28 which the French court had given might be treated as not an unreasonable sum at which such damages might be assessed. It was in that case that BOWEN, L.J., stated what was accepted by the learned judge in this case, that where you have an award or a judgment or, as here, a settlement, that is the limit of what the plaintiff can claim against the defendant. BOWEN, L.J., said (15 Q.B.D. 93): "The limit of the liability must clearly be what the purchaser had to pay." Dealing with the £28, BOWEN, L.J., said (ibid., 94):

"Now here, looking to the circumstances, can it be said that £28 was an unreasonable sum to give when it was quite certain there would be some liability as a matter of business and the plaintiff actually did suffer £28 damage?"

BOWEN, L.J., I think, clearly did not treat the fact that it was a judgment of the court as concluding the matter. It must be considered whether it was a reasonable sum.

Here, of course, we are dealing with a settlement, and counsel for the defendants drew our attention to Kiddle v. Lovett (4). There a platform put up for the plaintiffs by the defendant, to enable the plaintiffs to paint a house, fell and hurt a painter in the employment of the plaintiffs. The injured man brought an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, against the plaintiffs for injuries sustained in consequence of the defective state of the boat-staging. The plaintiffs settled the action by paying him £125. They then sued the defendant for breach of his contract, and it was held

"that the defendant was liable under the contract; but that, inasmuch as the plaintiffs had employed a competent contractor to put up the boat-staging, and there was, on the facts, no evidence of negligence by the plaintiffs, they were not liable to their servant for the injury he had sustained, and therefore the money which they had paid to settle his action was not recoverable as damages from the defendant for his breach of contract."

That, of course, turned on the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and it shows—and counsel for the plaintiffs did not dispute this—that it is open to the defendant to show: "You were not liable to pay anything, and, therefore, you cannot say that what you did pay is a sum you can recover against me."

Counsel for the plaintiffs also relied on Fisher v. Val de Travers Asphalte Co. (5). I will read the headnote (45 L.J.Q.B. 479):

"In consequence of the defective state of some asphalte pavement belonging to a tramway company, H., while driving over it in his cart, was thrown out and injured, and forthwith made a claim for compensation on the tramway company. The tramway company had made a contract with the plaintiffs, by which the plaintiffs were to lay down the asphalte and keep the same in repair for one year (at the time of the accident unexpired), and the plaintiffs had entered into a similar contract with the defendants. On receiving notice of H.'s claim the tramway company gave notice to the plaintiffs to meet it, and the plaintiffs handed on the notice to the defendants. The defendants refused to meet the claim, and the plaintiffs were compelled to undertake the case themselves, and forthwith entered into negotiations with H., which eventually resulted in a compromise of the claim for a certain sum paid to H. by way of compensation, with costs of settlement. In an action by the plaintiffs over against the defendants to recover the sum paid by way of compromise to H. and the costs incidental thereto, the jury found, that the compromise was reasonable and that the costs were reasonably incurred."

It was held, and this was the point that was overruled in Hammond & Co. v. Bussey (1), that the costs were not in law recoverable. The action was tried by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and a special jury, and the learned judge left two questions to the jury, which, with respect, really are only one question, but the jury held "that the plaintiffs had acted reasonably in compromising Hicks's claim, and that the sum paid as compensation was reasonable."

I think the effective question left was: Was the compensation reasonable? I think that indicates that there must have been at any rate some evidence (as, for instance, the nature of the injuries and so on) on which the jury could come to a conclusion on that point.

I think the learned judge, with respect, was wrong in regarding the settlement as wholly irrelevant. I think, though it is not conclusive, the fact that it is admittedly an upper limit would lead one to the conclusion that, if reasonable, it should be taken as the measure. The result of the learned judge's conclusion is that a plaintiff must prove his damages strictly and must show that they equal or exceed £43,000. If that involves, as it would here, a very complicated and expensive inquiry, still that has got to be done. The law, in my opinion, encourages reasonable settlements, particularly where, as here, strict proof would be a very expensive matter. The question, in my opinion, is: What evidence is necessary to establish reasonableness? I think it is relevant to prove that the settlement was made under legal advice. The client himself could do that, but I do not think that the advisers would normally be relevant or admissible witnesses. I say "normally," for it may be in special cases that they might be. The plaintiff must, I think, lead evidence, which can be cross-examined to, as to facts which the witnesses themselves prove and as to what would probably be proved if, as here, the arbitration had proceeded, so that the court can come to a conclusion whether the sum paid was reasonable. The defendant may, by cross-examination, as was done here, seek to show that it was not reasonable, or call evidence which leads to the same conclusion. He might in some cases show that some vital matter had been overlooked. In the present case, of course, counsel for the defendants relies, rightly, on the learned judge's finding with regard to the first head of damage, on the fact that the evidence showed that too much was bought, and so on, but if there is evidence at the end of the matter of the kind which I have indicated, on which the court can come to a conclusion that this was a reasonable settlement in the circumstances, then I think it should be the measure. Parties, as BOWEN, L.J., said in Hammond & Co. v. Bussey (1) (20 Q.B.D. 94), have been held to contemplate litigation in the sort of circumstances which have arisen here. It would, I think, be unfortunate if they were not also held to contemplate reasonable settlements in the type of circumstances which have arisen here.

If that is right, then I pass to the next question, which was: Do the plaintiffs show that, on the evidence, this was a reasonable settlement? That makes it necessary to examine the learned judge's conclusion on the two points, because I think that if the learned judge was right on the first point, viz., that only £6,750 was due in respect of the first head of damage, the unsold 1,400 tons, it might be difficult for the plaintiffs to satisfy me, at any rate, that the settlement was reasonable. With regard to those 1,400 tons, fifty were sold at about £11 per ton, and 1,350 were sold at £6 per ton in October, 1946. The learned judge referred to, and the defendants relied on, a number of statements in the inter-departmental communications with regard to the scarcity or plentifulness of the Dutch mastic and, what is very much the same thing put in another way, as to the view that too much Permasec had been bought. [His LORDSHIP considered the evidence relating to the reasonableness of the settlement. He came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs would have been fortunate if they had succeeded in keeping a claim under head A to £24,600, and he then continued:] I now pass to head B. The learned judge directed an inquiry, but he put certain limitations on it. Some limitations, of course, were accepted by everybody. The Dutch government would have had to show, in respect of a claim against them, that it had arisen from a defect covered by their contract with the plaintiffs. If they sold the material on different terms, more onerous terms, of course they could not make the plaintiffs responsible. The plaintiffs, as against the defendants, would have to show it was similarly covered by their contract. I am bound to say that the nature of the damage due to dripping, prima facie at any rate, would be a claim that could be passed on, because it goes, as the judge found, to the description of the article as an efficient adhesive.

The most important limitation is based on the principle to which the learned judge refers when he says ([1950] 2 All E.R. 868):

"It is, I think, clear that in this sort of case a plaintiff cannot pass on his liability to an outside party for bad quality if, before the sale to the outside party, he had notice of the defect in quality . . ."

As a principle, I think that would be accepted. Suppose, for example, the Dutch government had been told, before they sold any Permasec, that it would creep in hot weather and come dripping down through any holes that there might be, and they had still sold it for building, they could have claimed, of course, for the difference in value, if they paid for it, but they could not claim in respect of claims against them due to its creeping. The learned judge deals with the facts which he thinks lead to the limitation I am considering where he says:

"The defendants say that, if not at the time of the contract, at any rate by September, 1945, the Dutch government knew or ought to have known of the defects in the compound and should have taken action accordingly."

[His LORDSHIP considered the relevant facts and evidence and continued:] My conclusion with regard to this is that I do not think the defendants succeed in establishing that the Dutch government knew of anything with regard to this material which ought to have prevented them selling the quantities they did sell during the period before the creeping occurred, and it is not suggested that they sold any afterwards except the 1,350 tons at the £6 and another sale when the defects were well-known to everybody. That limitation, therefore, to my mind, cannot stand.

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the specific claims made against the Dutch government by persons who had used Permasec, or on whose houses the material had been used. The claims, which were mainly by contractors who understood the technicalities of costing, totalled (discounting some of them and disregarding others) some £32,000, and HIS LORDSHIP continued:] In these circumstances, having regard to the evidence here, I have come to the conclusion that this was a reasonable settlement. In my opinion, for the reasons which I have tried to give, the £43,000 is the measure of the defendants' liability to the plaintiffs, and there must be judgment for that amount, with the items of costs which are not disputed and with some arrangement as to interest about which we can be told.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is a very complicated dispute which arises out of two contracts for the sale of the material known as Permasec. At the time that the contracts were entered into, the defendants were informed by the plaintiffs of their negotiations with the Royal Netherlands government and of the purpose for which the material was required. The learned judge, in the course of his judgment, said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 863): "It is not disputed that the defendant ought to have foreseen a claim by the Dutch government . . ." That was, of course, in the event of a breach of contract. The facts are stated in the learned judge's judgment as follows (ibid., 861):

"Deliveries began in April, 1945, f.a.s. Miller's Wharf on the Thames. The Dutch government transported the material to Holland and re-sold it to numerous Dutch roofing contractors. The results of the application of Permasec were in many cases unsatisfactory. Most of it was applied in the winter of 1945, and in the warm spring of April, 1946, it began to drip and run—'creep' is the term used in the trade. Outside the buildings it dripped down from the eaves, and it found its way through the roofs and dripped inside the buildings too. The roofs had to be repaired or renewed, and claims were made on the Dutch government. In May, 1946, the government asked the plaintiffs and the defendants to take back 1,400 tons of the stuff which was unused, but they would not."

The result of this was a very large claim by the Royal Netherlands government against the plaintiffs. That government would not submit to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country, but they were willing to submit and did submit the dispute to arbitration. If they had sued in this country, the present plaintiffs would have been able to bring in the defendants, Permanite, Ltd., as third parties. The defendants were not willing to be bound in any sense by the arbitration. They disputed liability throughout. The arbitrator was to decide, in the first place, the question of liability between the Royal Netherlands government and the plaintiffs. Though there was much information as to the measure of damages in the event of liability being established, it is by no means clear that all the material was available. The present plaintiffs settled the dispute with the Dutch government on the basis of a payment or an allowance of £43,000 and costs. In due course the plaintiffs claimed against the defendants. The defendants contested the claim. DEVLIN, J., gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, but he did not accept the plaintiffs' contention that the proper measure of damages was the sum of £43,000, the settlement figure. In this court the defendants have not sought to dispute liability, and we have been concerned almost wholly with the plaintiffs' appeal that the damages awarded by the learned judge should be increased.

[HIS LORDSHIP read para. 12 (d) of the statement of claim, referred to para. 12 (g), and continued:] The plaintiffs said the damages should be the sum of £43,000, the amount of the settlement, which, they claimed, was reasonable. They did not ask for more. They must prove their damage. It is not enough for them to say: "We were advised to settle for £43,000 and we did so, and we now claim that sum." Before the court can award a sum as damages, there must be evidence on which the court can act. If the evidence they call satisfies the judge or a jury that the settlement was a reasonable one, the damages awarded will be the amount of the settlement and the costs reasonably incurred. I do not think that any good purpose is served by calling counsel who advised the settlement to say that he did so advise, even if the evidence is admissible. It could only be followed by questions as to why he so advised, and that would be asking him to do the work of the judge. Moreover, the duty of the judge at the trial is to determine the damages, and the facts proved before him might be quite different from those known to counsel at the time of his advice to settle for so much. The trial judge must make up his own mind on the facts he finds proved before him. At the same time, I am far from saying that the settlement ought to be disregarded. No one can think that a person or a company will agree to pay £43,000 damages lightly. It is a matter for consideration that the settlement was arrived at under advice, the more so as the party settling may be quite uncertain whether he can recover anything against someone else. If, on the evidence, the judge is satisfied that the damages would be somewhere around the figure at which the plaintiffs have settled, he will be justified in awarding the settlement figure. I do not consider that it is part of his duty to examine every item in those circumstances. The plaintiffs put forward their claim and call evidence to establish it. The defendants have an opportunity of cross-examining the plaintiffs' witnesses and of calling evidence themselves. The plaintiffs must establish a prima facie case that the settlement was a reasonable one. If the defendants fail to shake that case, the amount of the settlement can properly be awarded as damages. The position is much the same, though, perhaps, not quite so strong, as in a case in which damages have been assessed in a suit between other parties involving the same facts. The judgment is not binding, but the court will not lightly disregard it in the absence of fresh evidence or new factors.

In this case, there was before DEVLIN, J., some evidence which may not have been available at the time of the settlement. I refer to the answers of Mr. Hijdelaar which show that the Royal Netherlands government had over-bought to some extent. It may be that this was before the plaintiffs' advisers at the time of the arbitration, for it was clearly indicated in the documents. Nonetheless, the answers did provide material on which the defendants were able to base an argument that the damages were not so high as the plaintiffs claimed. After full examination of all the evidence, I do not think it was sufficient to displace the case which the plaintiffs had set up, that this was a reasonable settlement. The question is not whether the plaintiffs acted reasonably in settling the claim, but whether the settlement was a reasonable one, and, in considering it, the court is entitled to bear in mind the fact that costs would grow every day the litigation was continued. That is one reason for saying that it is sufficient for the purpose of the plaintiffs if they satisfy the judge that a figure in the neighbourhood of the settlement would have been awarded as damages.

This view is supported by the decision in the case of Fisher v. Val de Travers Asphalte Co. (5), to which my Lord referred and in which the second of the questions left by the learned judge to the jury was whether the sum paid as compensation was reasonable and the jury found that it was. In that case, in the course of the argument, BRETT, J., asked counsel (45 L.J.Q.B. 480):

"Supposing Hicks had claimed £1,000, which, as the damages really amounted to £110, we now know would be excessive, and the plaintiffs had paid, could they have recovered that from the defendants?"

Counsel gave the answer: "No, because the plaintiffs would have to show they paid the proper compensation." That I believe to be the test. It is interesting to notice that, according to the report of that case in the LAW TIMES REPORTS, in the judgment of BRETT, J., there appeared this passage (35 L.T. 368):

"As to the damages themselves, we refused to grant a rule to the defendants to enable them to raise the question as to their liability to repay them to the plaintiffs, and the Court of Appeal have held that we were right in so refusing."

It, therefore, appears that the same question was considered by the Court of Appeal in that case.

In Grébert-Borgnis v. Nugent (3), DENMAN, J., the trial judge,

"having found as a fact the contract and breach and that the defendants knew that the contract was to enable the plaintiff to fulfil his contract with Messrs. Seppe as above stated, and that the profit which the plaintiff lost by not fulfilling his contract with Messrs. Seppe was £34, held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover not only £34, but also £28, which, on the principle laid down in Elbinger Act. v. Armstrong (6), he assessed as a reasonable sum by way of damages for the breach of contract by the defendants. The learned judge therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff for £62."

The Court of Appeal held that DENMAN, J., had assessed the damages on the right principle. He had evidence before him and he came to the conclusion that the amount awarded in the French court of £28 was a reasonable sum by way of damages.

In this arbitration there were two heads of damages put forward by the Royal Netherlands government. They were, under head A, £49,300 in respect of the 1,400 tons left on the hands of the Dutch government, and, under head B, something over £52,000 in respect of claims for damages received by the Royal Netherlands government through the material being faulty. Several large items under head B seem to me to have been clearly established by the evidence given before the learned judge. (I should add that further large claims were received after the date of the arbitration and after the settlement). I do not know whether head A or head B is the more important. I regard them both as highly important, and, having for a number of days considered the evidence, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs were fortunate in being able to settle with the Royal Netherlands government at £43,000. I do not think it is necessary for the plaintiffs to show that there was a liability of at least £43,000, though I think there was. I am satisfied that this was not only a reasonable settlement, but a good one from the point of view of the plaintiffs in this action, and I think the judge ought to have so held. The judge awarded a very much smaller sum than I should have done in respect of the 1,400 tons left on the hands of the Royal Netherlands government, and he directed an inquiry in regard to the measure of damages recoverable for the use of the faulty material, head B. The cost of such an inquiry must be extraordinarily high, involving the employment of Dutch lawyers and others, and prolonged investigations in Holland. It would be necessary, if there was a doubt as to the wisdom and righteousness of the settlement. I am happy to think it can be avoided. The plaintiffs have satisfied me that the settlement was proper in every sense. The damages could not have been less. The plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against the defendants for the amount of the settlement, and there is no necessity for the inquiry which the learned judge directed. I agree that the appeal of the plaintiffs should be allowed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal allowed.

Re PEROWNE (deceased). PEROWNE AND ANOTHER v. MOSS AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), May 4, 1951.]

Power of Appointment—"For the benefit of my family"—No gift over in default of appointment—Implication of gift to members of class—Power in nature of a trust.

By her will (which was home-drawn), dated Apr. 5, 1944, a testatrix, who died on Feb. 19, 1945, gave and bequeathed "unto my dear husband. All my real and personal estate of whatever nature for his absolute benefit for life. Knowing that he will make arrangements for the disposal of my estate, according to my wishes, for the benefit of my family after his death . . . Should my husband predecease me, I wish all the clauses of his will, and the desires expressed, to stand." The testatrix's husband survived her, dying on Nov. 16, 1948, and by his will, dated Feb. 12, 1946, purported to appoint her estate (in the events which happened) to the widows of deceased brothers of the testatrix. The court having held that the purported appointment was excessive and void, on the question as to the devolution of the testatrix's estate,

HELD: notwithstanding the absence of a gift over in default of the husband's exercise of his power of appointment, no trust in favour of the class described as "my family" could be implied because the words of the will were not imperative and did not otherwise indicate a clear intention what class should take, and, therefore, the court would not exercise the power and the property devolved on the intestacy of the testatrix.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, on the true construction of the will of Florence Ada Perowne, (i) whether her husband was entitled to an absolute interest in the whole of her estate or was entitled during his life only; (ii) if the husband was entitled only to a life interest, whether the will made any disposition beyond that life estate; (iii) if the husband was by the will given a power of appointment, whether he had validly exercised it by his will; and (iv) if the said power had not been validly exercised, whether there should be implied in the will of the testatrix a gift to any and what class of persons, or whether the property devolved on the intestacy of the testatrix.

HARMAN, J., held that (i) the husband was entitled to a life interest only; (ii) the husband was entitled to a power to appoint the property among the family of the testatrix; and (iii) the purported exercise thereof by the husband's will was excessive and void. On question (iv), on which the case is reported.

G. D. Johnston for the plaintiffs, the executors of the husband and (by representation) of the testatrix.

Winterbotham for the first and second defendants, personal representatives of a deceased brother of the testatrix.

D. A. Ziegler for the third defendant, a nephew of the testatrix.

Bland for the fifth and seventh defendants, a nephew and a sister-in-law of the testatrix.

J. L. Arnold for the sixth defendant, a nephew of the testatrix.

The fourth defendant died before the summons was heard.

HARMAN, J.: I have now to decide whether there is a gift impliedly to some class in default of appointment or merely a power to the husband of the testatrix not coupled with a trust. If the latter, he had no duty to exercise it and the court has no duty to exercise it for him, and the property will, therefore, go on the intestacy of the testatrix. The words are:

"Knowing that he will make arrangements for the disposal of my estate, according to my wishes, for the benefit of my family after his death."

The object of the wish or the knowledge or the trust is "my family after his death." One must, therefore, first inquire what may have been meant by that.

"Family," when regarded as an object of a power, means anybody with blood relationship and is not confined to those nearest of kin or the statutory next of kin of the testator. That appears from Grant v. Lynam (1), where the side-note reads:

"Where a donor recommends or directs, that the donee, at her death, shall give his personal property to such of his family or such of his relations as she shall think fit, the donee has a power to select the objects of her bounty amongst his relations or family, though not within the degree of next of kin. But if the donee does not exercise the power, the word 'relations,' or the word 'family,' will be construed 'next of kin,' unless the special expressions of the donee have a different import."

SIR JOHN LEACH, M.R., says (4 Russ. 296):

"Upon the other point, whether the gift to John Grant [a person in whose favour the donee of the power purported to exercise it] is good he not being one of the testator's next of kin, the leading case is Harding v. Glyn (2), imperfectly reported in Atkyns, but correctly referred to in other cases . . ."

Then he deals with Harding v. Glyn (2), where there was a gift to one Henry Swindale. As reported, that case did not deal with the question whether the gift of a house to Henry Swindale was good or not, but SIR JOHN LEACH, M.R., by sending for the record, discovered that the gift to Henry Swindale was established, and he concludes (ibid., 297):

"The principle, therefore, of that case is, that, where the author of the power uses the term 'relations,' and the donee does not exercise the power, there the court will adopt the statute of distributions as a convenient rule of construction, and will give the property to the next of kin; but that the donee, who exercises the power, has a right of selection among the relations of the donor, although not within the degree of next of kin."

Therefore, the donee of the power (the husband) in the present case had a wider class to select from than the statutory next of kin of the donor of the power. It would appear that, if there is to be an implication, it must be one in favour, not of the class among which the donee of the power could scatter his bounty, but of the narrower class which the court would choose, because otherwise the gift would be void for uncertainty. It seems to me that the question can be shortly stated: Does the power here given to the husband import a trust, or does it not? If it does, then there appears to be conclusive authority for the view that the court will exercise the power in favour of the narrower class in Cruwys v. Colman (3). There, SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., came to the conclusion that, the lady who was the donee of the power having refused to exercise it in favour of her family, the court would exercise it in favour of her next of kin, but he had no difficulty there in finding that there was a trust. He said (9 Ves. 324):

"But all that Bridget [the donee of the power] has said, is, that she does not think fit to exercise her power. Therefore the trust remains unexecuted; . . . that is, in favour of the next of kin . . ."

If, therefore, this power be one coupled with a trust, that case teaches me how to decide, but the question is whether there is such a trust, and that depends, I think, on Re Weekes' Settlement (4) and Re Combe (5). Those cases are both to the same effect. In FARWELL ON POWERS, 3rd ed. (published in 1916), p. 529, the learned editor, SIR CHRISTOPHER FARWELL, expressed some disapproval of Re Weekes (4), and was of the opinion that the rule of implying a gift to a class in default of appointment was inflexible. SIR ROBERT ROMER did not think so in Re Weekes (4), and TOMLIN, J., when he came to decide Re Combe (5), agreed with ROMER, J. I must take it, and I think it has been accepted by the profession since, that the law is that there is no rigid rule, and FARWELL ON POWERS puts it too high. In Re Combe (5) TOMLIN, J., says ([1925] Ch. 216):

"The matter then stands really in this way. Am I to approach this will governed by an inflexible and artificial rule of construction to the effect that where I find a power of appointment to a class not followed by any gift in default of appointment, I am bound to imply a gift to that class in default of the exercise of the power? Or ought I to approach this will for the purpose of construction in the same spirit as I approach any other will and endeavour to construe it and arrive at the testator's meaning by examining the words expressly used, only implying those things which are necessarily and reasonably to be implied?"

Then he says that FARWELL ON POWERS would have him take one view and Re Weekes (4) would have him take the other. He then discusses Re Hughes (6), a decision of SARGANT, J., and comes to the conclusion that that does not quarrel with Re Weekes (4). Finally he says (ibid., 218):

"I therefore propose, in construing this will, to govern myself by the principle which has been enunciated by ROMER, J."

That principle was explained by ROMER, J., in Re Weekes' Settlement (4) as follows ([1897] 1 Ch. 292):

"The authorities do not show, in my opinion, that there is a hard and fast rule that a gift to A for life with a power to A to appoint among a class and nothing more must, if there is no gift over in the will, be held a gift by implication to the class in default of the power being exercised. In my opinion the cases show . . . that you must find in the will an indication that the testatrix did intend the class or some of the class to take—intended in fact that the power should be regarded in the nature of a trust—only a power of selection being given, as, for example, a gift to A for life with a gift over to such of a class as A shall appoint."

Where there is in a marriage settlement a gift to such of the children as A shall appoint, or in trust for such members of a class as he shall by writing indicate, it is very easy to assume a gift over in default, because that is the natural thing to suppose, but where the class is large and indefinite it seems to me much more difficult to suppose it. It is true that SIR WILLIAM GRANT did hold that there was a trust in Cruwys v. Colman (3), but in that case there were very imperative words, mandatory words, in the will. They were "it is my absolute desire." In Re Combe (5) there was a gift over which was initially absolute, but which was cut down in favour of relations of the whole blood, whatever that might have meant. "Relations" is not much more indefinite than "family," which may in fact mean relations of the whole blood or, indeed in certain circumstances, may, apparently, mean persons not related by blood. It seems to me, therefore, that I must find very clear words to imply a trust here, because it follows from the artificial rule that the court has had to adopt that the persons in whose favour the trust, if any, is to be implied are not the persons among whom the power of selection existed. That alone makes it very difficult to import a trust. The testatrix says:

"Knowing that he will make arrangements for the disposal of my estate according to my wishes . . ."

One would guess that she knew that her husband knew what her wishes were and, for some reason or other, she did not wish to dispose of her estate herself. She hoped he would do it, and then she says "for the benefit of my family." I cannot spell a trust out of that. It seems to me to constitute a mere power to distribute among a large and indefinite class of people, different from those in whose favour an implied trust would operate. I do not feel able to imply a trust, and so I come to the conclusion that, the husband having failed to execute the power, the property passed on her intestacy.

Order accordingly.

VINEY v. VINEY.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Havers, J.), May 24, 1951.]

Divorce—Condonation—Condonation by husband—Adultery of wife—Resumption of sexual intercourse—No fraud on part of the wife.

In 1947 the wife, having obtained a maintenance order against the husband on the ground of his wilful neglect to maintain her, left him, taking with her the children of the marriage, but a few months later the order was discharged on the ground of the wife's adultery. In March, 1950, the wife returned to the husband's house because she had nowhere to go and on several occasions the husband had sexual intercourse with her. In October, 1950, the husband turned the wife out of the house. The wife then took out a summons for desertion.

HELD: as the husband, with full knowledge of the wife's adultery and without any fraud on her part, had sexual intercourse with her, he could not be heard to say that he had not condoned her adultery and reinstated her as his wife; he had turned her out of the house in October, 1950; and, therefore, there was no answer to her charge of desertion.

Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin ([1944] 1 All E.R. 44), followed.

Whitney v. Whitney ([1951] 1 All E.R. 301), disapproved.

APPEAL by the wife against an order of a metropolitan magistrate, made on Dec. 5, 1950, dismissing her summons against her husband for a maintenance order on the ground of his desertion.

Empson for the wife.

Hollins for the husband.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a wife's appeal from the dismissal by a metropolitan magistrate of her summons on the ground of the husband's desertion. In my opinion, this case raises a question of some importance, and it will be necessary to consider the bearing on it of certain authorities. None of these authorities, nor, indeed, any authority, was brought to the attention of the learned magistrate. Before I deal with the law it is necessary to give an outline of the facts. The magistrate plainly accepted the version of the husband in preference to that of the wife, and I propose to deal with this case on the footing that where there is any conflict of evidence the husband's version is, therefore, to be preferred.

The parties were married in June, 1945. They had two children, now aged six and four respectively, and a guardianship order had been made in February, 1950, in favour of the husband. In July, 1947, the wife obtained a maintenance order on the ground of the husband's wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance. She left her husband and went to live with her mother, taking the children with her, but on Nov. 28, 1947, her order was discharged on the ground of her adultery. There was no appeal from that discharge. On a date in 1950, about which there is some controversy, but which I will assume is correctly stated by the husband as being Mar. 30, she returned to her husband's roof. According to her own account she meant to effect a reconciliation, but the magistrate accepted the version of the husband that she never really tried, so to speak, to pull her weight, and that it was his efforts at reconciliation which were unavailing.

I come now to the crucial point in the case. On more than one occasion—certainly, I think, not less than three times—the husband had sexual intercourse with his wife. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, said that it was completely destructive of any suggestion that the wife induced the husband to resume sexual relations with her by false pretences, and continued:] Now I come to a fact which is vital to the wife's case, and about which there is no dispute. On Oct. 27, after this uneasy attempt at a fresh start, the husband turned the wife out. He says that he did so because “she was coming and going as she pleased, and I could not stand it any longer.” The position, therefore, is this. It is quite clear that when the wife returned to the husband's home she was completely at his mercy. He says that he received her out of pity, because she had nowhere to go, and I assume that to be the case, and it is clear that if she came, so to speak, merely as a lodger or a refugee, the husband's position, established by the revocation of the wife's order of 1947 on the ground of her subsequent adultery, would remain completely unimpaired. That, in effect, is what the magistrate found. He said:

"I was quite satisfied that there had been no resumption of cohabitation between the parties. I believe that the husband took the wife into his home because she was destitute and had nowhere to go. His housekeeper endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between them and the husband co-operated and had sexual intercourse with her for this purpose. The attempt failed by reason of the conduct of his wife. I was satisfied that she was, during the period she resided there, very rarely in the house, and that she never attempted to do any housework or behave as a wife. In so far as her evidence conflicts with the evidence of her husband and/or his housekeeper I unhesitatingly prefer their evidence."

The question is whether, as a matter of law, it is possible for the magistrate to have satisfied himself that there had been no resumption of cohabitation between the parties. So far as I am aware no authorities were cited to the magistrate, but there is a decision of WILLMER, J., in Whitney v. Whitney (1) which it is plainly necessary for us to consider. So far as I am aware, it is the only authority by which this decision could possibly be supported. The point of the decision in Whitney v. Whitney (1), as appears in the headnote, is this:

"(i) Desertion, once established, continued until it was proved to have been brought to an end; the fact that intercourse took place on a number of occasions during genuine efforts by the husband to effect a reconciliation did not bring the wife's desertion to an end; and, therefore, the husband was entitled to a decree of divorce. (ii) even if, whenever intercourse took place, the husband must be taken to have condoned the wife's previous desertion, that desertion was on each occasion revived by the wife's repeated refusal to resume cohabitation."

Two authorities were considered in the course of that case, and it will be necessary for us to consider them and their bearing on this case, and one authority was not considered, which seems to be decisive both of this case and of Whitney v. Whitney (1). The two authorities which were considered were Mummery v. Mummery (2), a decision of my own which has had the approval of the Court of Appeal, and Bartram v. Bartram (3), the case in which Mummery v. Mummery (2) was approved. The case which was not considered is Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4).

I need not go into Mummery v. Mummery (2) in detail, because it was fully reviewed in Bartram v. Bartram (3), but it is, I think, desirable to say this. It was a very special case. The wife had been deserted for years, but she ardently desired to effect a reconciliation and she took advantage of the fact that her husband, rescued from Dunkirk, had called on her on his way to the home where he was living, to attempt to effect a reconciliation by letting him sleep with her that night and have sexual intercourse. The question was whether the desertion theretofore established was interrupted, or, alternatively, condoned, by that fact. The key to the decision was that the wife alone desired reconciliation, while the husband made it plain beyond the shadow of a doubt that he had not the slightest wish or intention to resume cohabitation with her. The two things which it is, in my opinion, vital to remember in Mummery v. Mummery (2)—and I say this because when we come to Bartram v. Bartram (3) and the use of certain passages from one of the judgments in that case by WILLMER, J., in Whitney v. Whitney (1), it will be seen, I think, that WILLMER, J., has misunderstood the true effect of Mummery v. Mummery (2)—are these: (i) that it was the wife who was the petitioner, not the husband, and (ii) that there was no bilateral intention to resume cohabitation. It was plainly a case of a unilateral wish on the part of the wife, rejected in the plainest possible terms by the husband. I need cite only one sentence from my judgment ([1942] 1 All E.R. 555):

“I think the law is that, as regards the wife at any rate, an act of sexual intercourse is not conclusive on the question of condonation; and that it does not raise an irrebuttable presumption that cohabitation has been resumed.”

A I pause to observe that that judgment was given before the House of Lords, in Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4), re-emphasised in unmistakable manner the essential difference between the position of a husband and that of a wife in relation to evidence of sexual intercourse as proof of condonation.

B Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4) was a case of a husband's petition on the ground of adultery. The wife had committed adultery, but she promised her husband that, if he would forgive her, she would break off all acquaintance with the co-respondent. Thereupon, intercourse took place, but early next morning the wife's attitude changed and she said she did not see why she should stop seeing the co-respondent. It was held that, as there was no evidence that, when it was made, the wife's promise was a fraudulent mis-statement of her state of mind, the husband's act in consenting to intercourse amounted to condonation
C debarring him from obtaining a divorce; sexual intercourse amounted to condonation of a wife's adultery unless she had induced it by a fraudulent mis-statement of fact; and a breach of an assurance as to future conduct would not remove the disabling consequences of condonation, since there was no such thing as contingent condonation. It is vital to the decision of the present appeal to consider the essential points in the reasoning of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., whose D opinion was formally concurred in by the other learned Lords. He said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 45):

“The essence of the matter is (taking the case where it is the wife who has been guilty of the matrimonial offence) that the husband with knowledge of the wife's offence should forgive her and should confirm his forgiveness by reinstating her as his wife. Whether this further reinstatement goes to the E length of connubial intercourse depends on circumstances, for there may be cases where it is enough to say that the wife has been received back into the position of wife in the home, though further intercourse has not taken place. But where it has taken place, this will, subject to one exception, amount to clear proof that the husband has carried his forgiveness into effect.”

F LORD SIMON went on to deal with the issue of fraud. I have already dealt with that, and counsel for the husband frankly admitted that it was impossible for him to say, in view of the evidence, that the sexual intercourse in this case had been obtained by fraud. Mummery v. Mummery (2) had been cited to their lordships. It was not specifically mentioned in the speech of LORD SIMON, but he said (ibid.):

G “It has been more than once pointed out that the conclusion of condonation by an innocent wife of her husband's previous misconduct is not in all cases so strictly drawn from the fact of subsequent intercourse, for there may be instances where the innocent wife, owing to the difficulties of her situation, may have no means of immediately breaking off relations.”

I need not read the rest of the passage, but it develops the same point, and
H LORD SIMON, after referring to a decision of this court in Abercrombie v. Abercrombie (5), which was exactly in point, said (ibid., 46):

“Condonation is not a contract at all; it is the overlooking of past wrongs accompanied by action on the part of the aggrieved spouse which shows that they are really forgiven, and the circumstance that the guilty party, before or at the time of condonation, makes promises as to future conduct cannot lead to the consequence that previous offences are no longer condoned, if and when the promises are afterwards repudiated.”

Then he refers once more to the question of fraud, with which I need not deal further.

It seems to me that the magistrate unfortunately did not have this case cited to him and the statement of his reasons expresses exactly the contrary of what LORD SIMON said at the beginning of his speech. After saying that there had been no resumption of cohabitation between the parties and that the husband had taken the wife into his home because she was destitute and had nowhere to go, the magistrate said:

"His housekeeper endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between them and the husband co-operated and had sexual intercourse with her for this purpose. The attempt failed by reason of the conduct of his wife."

LORD SIMON said exactly the opposite. He said there may be a reinstatement without sexual intercourse, but, as against the husband, if there is sexual intercourse and no fraud, that is conclusive of the fact that the husband has confirmed his forgiveness by reinstating his wife as his wife. The magistrate treated as being the vital matter the husband's wish to effect a reconciliation and not the conclusive acts which show that a reconciliation had, in fact, been effected.

Bartram v. Bartram (3) affirms and approves the judgment in Mummery v. Mummery (2). It is necessary to refer to it because the judgment of the magistrate can only be supported by upholding the decision in Whitney v. Whitney (1), and Whitney v. Whitney (1) turns, as I think, on an incorrect appreciation of the effect of Bartram v. Bartram (3). It is essential to remember in considering Bartram v. Bartram (3) that the element of sexual intercourse was completely absent. That is all-important, because it was a case in which the husband was the petitioner. His petition was based on an allegation of desertion. As in this case, the husband took the wife under his roof because she had nowhere else to go, but she resolutely refused all overtures of reconciliation, and, as I say, no sexual intercourse took place. In those circumstances the Court of Appeal adopted from Mummery v. Mummery (2) the view that a resumption of cohabitation involved bilateral intention, and I only think it necessary to make one passing comment, if I may be allowed to do so, on one passage in the judgment of DENNING, L.J. He said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 273):

"Once the period of desertion has begun to run, it does not cease to run simply because the parties attempt a reconciliation and for that purpose come together again for a time. That was laid down by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Mummery v. Mummery (2), and has never been doubted since."

I should not venture to make even this observation if it were not that this particular passage forms the foundation of the judgment of WILLMER, J., in Whitney v. Whitney (1). I have already tried to explain that the whole point of Mummery v. Mummery (2) was that the parties (in the plural) did not attempt a reconciliation. It was one party who attempted the reconciliation, while the other resolutely resisted it. That is not merely the point of the decision itself, but is also the point of the argument, so to speak, leading up to the decision, for I see that I am reported as saying ([1942] 1 All E.R. 555):

"It would, for example, be quite ludicrous if, because during a period of desertion the parties met by arrangement to talk over their difficulties, and the deserted wife did her very best to persuade her husband to come back, while he remained obdurate, one were bound to hold that meetings of that sort, however protracted, and even if they involved spending the night under the same roof together or several nights under the same roof together, interrupted or brought to an end the state of desertion."

The whole emphasis was on the fact that the intention or the attempt to effect a reconciliation was unilateral, and not bilateral. For the rest, although that passage in the judgment of DENNING, L.J., is used by WILLMER, J., in support of his decision in Whitney v. Whitney (1), I think it is only necessary to say that when DENNING, L.J., said that ([1949] 1 All E.R. 273)

“... the period of desertion does not cease to run unless, and until, a true reconciliation has been effected... Any other view would greatly hamper attempts at reconciliation, because it would mean that the deserted party would be disinclined to take the other back for fear of losing his legal rights in case the reconciliation was unsuccessful”, the passage must be read, as every judgment must be read, according to the subject-matter. It is not fair to DENNING, L.J., to take it out of its context and to assume that he is laying down that in all circumstances, including such circumstances as those in the present case, because a reconciliation does not ultimately come about, therefore desertion should be held to have been continuing the whole time. It was a judgment delivered in a case of a husband's petition where the element of sexual intercourse, not induced by fraud, was completely lacking.

That brings me finally to the judgment in Whitney v. Whitney (1). In December, 1945, the wife left her husband in circumstances which were held to amount to desertion on her part. Between that time and August, 1947, the husband visited the wife on a number of occasions to effect a reconciliation. On those occasions the parties resumed marital intercourse, but the wife maintained throughout her determination not to return to live with her husband. The husband's answer alleging desertion by the wife was dated July 17, 1950. In other words, the date in August, 1947, when the husband last visited the wife, was within the triennium. WILLMER, J., held, nevertheless, that there was no interruption to the period of desertion, and, incidentally, that there was no condonation. I have already observed that Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4) does not appear to have been referred to. Mummery v. Mummery (2) was examined at length, including the sentence which I have already read about the act of sexual intercourse not being conclusive on the question of condonation, as regards the wife, at any rate. With regard to that WILLMER, J., said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 304):

“Clearly in that case LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the proposition of law on which he was relying in terms wide enough... to cover the present case. It may be argued that what the President said was peculiar to the case before him, which is a conclusive authority only in a case where a single act of intercourse took place and where the innocent party was the wife. Here we have, not one occasion, but a number of occasions to deal with, and it may be said that this is not, like Mummery v. Mummery (2), a case of an innocent party permitting intercourse on only one occasion at the instance of the other party. The facts in this case are, undoubtedly, different from those in Mummery v. Mummery (2), and if that case stood alone, wide as the President's words are, I might have experienced some difficulty in holding that they extended to cover the present case. But I have also received assistance from Bartram v. Bartram (3), a decision of the Court of Appeal.”

Before I pass on to what the learned judge said about Bartram v. Bartram (3), I venture to dissent from the description of my judgment in Mummery v. Mummery (2) implied in the phrase “wide as the... words are.” Although, as I have said, at that time Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4) had not been decided, I was very careful to say ([1942] 1 All E.R. 555) “as regards the wife at any rate”, and I was dealing with the petition of a deserted wife. Then WILLMER, J., goes on to deal with Bartram v. Bartram (3). He refers to the citation in that case of Mummery v. Mummery (2) and then relies on the passage in the judgment of DENNING, L.J., contained in the first paragraph of that judgment, to which I have just referred, and concludes ([1951] 1 All E.R. 306):

"That case, it appears to me, carries with it an authoritative statement on principle by the Court of Appeal, and it is for me to apply that principle as best I can to the present case."

Applying it, he came to the conclusion that desertion had never been interrupted.

I venture to say that the learned judge misdirected himself, because he ignored the vital facts that in Bartram v. Bartram (3) there was lacking the essential element, which is present in this case, that the husband petitioner had voluntarily had sexual intercourse with his wife and that Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4) decides that that is absolutely conclusive of the fact that he has thereby reinstated her as his wife. It seems to me, with the greatest possible respect to the learned judge, that it is impossible to hold, in relation to a long period during which at intervals the husband has voluntarily had sexual intercourse with his wife with the express object of effecting a reconciliation, that there has been no reinstatement at all and that desertion was running continuously throughout the period, or that an alternation of condonation and revival after each act of sexual intercourse leads to the same conclusion.

The judgment of the magistrate in the present case can only be supported, in my opinion, if Whitney v. Whitney (1) was rightly decided. I think it was wrongly decided and that it is our duty to say so. I think, equally, that the magistrate's judgment is insupportable when once the suggestion of fraud is eliminated, and it is admitted that it is eliminated by the history of the resumption of sexual intercourse in this case. For these reasons I think that this appeal succeeds, for, there being no longer the impediment of her adultery, the wife has been thrown out of the matrimonial home for reasons which could not possibly be considered as being "a grave and weighty matter," if once it is established, as I think it is established, that the husband had in law reinstated her as his wife. That being so, there is no answer to her charge of desertion, and the matter must be referred back to the magistrate for him to settle the amount of the order unless an amount can be agreed on.

HAVERS, J.: I agree with the conclusion at which my Lord has arrived, and also with the reasons which he has given for that conclusion. As, however, we are differing from the magistrate, I think it desirable to give my own reasons in my own words. This is a wife's appeal from the dismissal by the magistrate of her summons against her husband on the ground of desertion. I desire to say that, in view of the reasons which the magistrate has given, I shall base my judgment, so far as the facts are concerned, on the evidence of the husband where it conflicts with the evidence of the wife.

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The question for us to determine is whether, as regards a husband, an act or acts of sexual intercourse is or are conclusive on the question of condonation. No authorities were cited to the learned magistrate. If the decision of the House of Lords in Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4) had been cited to him, I cannot help feeling that he would have been very unlikely to come to the conclusion to which he did. My Lord has already cited the passages from the speech of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4), a speech with which the other learned Lords agreed, and it seems to me that the passage in [1944] 1 All E.R. 45, already read by my Lord, clearly establishes the law relating to condonation in a case where it is the wife who has been guilty of the matrimonial offence. LORD SIMON specified the one exception, namely, a case where the intercourse was induced by fraudulent mis-statement of fact by the wife. In another passage he said (ibid., 46):

"There cannot be such a thing as contingent condonation by a husband of his wife's adultery—certainly not when the condonation includes the irrevocable act of sexual connection."

In the light of that decision it seems to me to be clearly established that a husband who, with knowledge of a matrimonial offence committed by his wife, has sexual intercourse with her, cannot in law be heard to say that he has not condoned that matrimonial offence and reinstated her as a wife. I leave out the particular exception to which LORD SIMON referred, since, as my Lord has mentioned in his judgment, it was made clear by counsel for the husband that he was not in a position to contend on the facts of the present case that the sexual intercourse which took place was effected by means of any fraud on the part of the wife. In my opinion, the decision in Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4) is conclusive on the case which we have to determine, and in the light of that decision it seems to me that the magistrate's decision cannot possibly be supported in law.

It would be enough to dispose of this case for me to leave the matter there, but, as certain cases have been discussed in argument, and, it may be, that one of those cases was in the mind of the magistrate when he reached his conclusion, I will make a brief reference to them. The first is Mummery v. Mummery (2). As my Lord has pointed out, there were two fundamental facts on which that judgment was based. The first fact was that there it was an innocent wife who was the petitioner and consented to the act of marital intercourse and not a husband, and the second fact was that only one party desired a reconciliation, namely, the wife. In my view, the scope of the judgment can be ascertained from a short passage which my Lord has already cited ([1942] 1 All E.R. 555). I find nothing in Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4) which is in the least degree inconsistent with that judgment having the limited application which I think it has and was intended to have. On the contrary, LORD SIMON said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 45):

"It has been more than once pointed out that the conclusion of condonation by an innocent wife of her husband's previous misconduct is not in all cases so strictly drawn from the fact of subsequent intercourse, for there may be instances where the innocent wife, owing to the difficulties of her situation, may have no means of immediately breaking off relations."

That case, as I read it, has no application to the facts of this case at all.

The only other case to which I think I ought to refer is Whitney v. Whitney (1), because it may be prayed in aid to support the decision of the magistrate in this case. My Lord has already pointed out that the facts there were that in December, 1945, the wife left her husband in circumstances which were held to amount to desertion on her part. Between that time and August, 1947, the husband visited the wife on a number of occasions to effect a reconciliation. On those occasions the parties resumed marital intercourse, but the wife maintained throughout her determination not to return to live with her husband, and the husband's answer alleging desertion by the wife was dated July 17, 1950. WILLMER, J., held, first of all, that "desertion, once established, continued until it was proved to have been brought to an end; the fact that intercourse took place on a number of occasions during genuine efforts by the husband to effect a reconciliation did not bring the wife's desertion to an end; and, therefore, the husband was entitled to a decree of divorce"; and he held, secondly:

"even if, whenever, intercourse took place, the husband must be taken to have condoned the wife's previous desertion, that desertion was on each occasion revived by the wife's repeated refusal to resume cohabitation."

If I interpret the judgment correctly, WILLMER, J., seems to have founded himself partly on the view which he took of the decision of my Lord in Mummery v. Mummery (2), and partly on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bartram v. Bartram (3), but he does appear to have had some doubt whether Mummery v.

Mummery (2) was ever intended to be applied beyond the particular facts to which it related, because he said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 304):

"Clearly in that case LORD MERRIMAN, P., stated the proposition of law on which he was relying in terms wide enough, it seems to me, to cover the present case. It may be argued that what the President said was peculiar to the case before him, which is a conclusive authority only in a case where a single act of intercourse took place and where the innocent party was the wife. Here we have, not one occasion, but a number of occasions to deal with, and it may be said that this is not, like Mummery v. Mummery (2), a case of an innocent party permitting intercourse on only one occasion at the instance of the other party. The facts in this case are, undoubtedly, different from those in Mummery v. Mummery (2), and if that case stood alone, wide as the President's words are, I might have experienced some difficulty in holding that they extended to cover the present case."

It seems that, notwithstanding that passage, the judge did take the view that Mummery v. Mummery (2) was wide enough to cover the facts of the case with which he was dealing. I feel unable to take the same view as to the extension of Mummery v. Mummery (2) beyond the facts of the case to which it related. It will be observed that Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4) was not cited in Whitney v. Whitney (1), and if and so far as Whitney v. Whitney (1) purports to decide that a husband who, with full knowledge of his wife's matrimonial offence, has sexual intercourse with her does not in law condone that offence, I feel constrained to say that I am unable to agree with it, and am bound to express my opinion that it has not been correctly decided.

The other case from which the learned judge stated that he derived assistance was Bartram v. Bartram (3). It is unnecessary for me to do more than say that with regard to that case my Lord has pointed out that one essential element was missing in Bartram v. Bartram (3), namely, there was no intercourse by the husband with his wife, and, for the reasons which my Lord has given, I take the view, with great respect to the learned judge, that Bartram v. Bartram (3) does not support the conclusion at which he arrived. I am, therefore, of the opinion that this case is covered by the decision of the House of Lords in Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4), and that in law the conclusion of the magistrate cannot be supported. I agree that the appeal must succeed.

Appeal allowed.

HARLING v. EDDY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning, L.J., and Roxburgh, J.), May 24, 25, 1951.]

Sale of Goods—Condition—Warranty—Auction—Conditions in catalogue excluding warranty unless specially mentioned and appearing in account—Oral guarantee.

A catalogue relating to a sale by auction of cattle described therein as tuberculin-tested Guernseys contained the condition: "(12) No animal, article, or thing is sold with a 'warranty' unless specially mentioned at the time of offering, and no warranty so given shall have any legal force or effect unless the terms thereof appear on the purchaser's account." On June 30, 1950, at the sale, the defendant offered for sale a freshly calved heifer. Buyers were reluctant to bid owing to the unpromising appearance of the heifer, and the defendant thereupon stated that nothing was wrong with her, that he would absolutely guarantee her, and that he would be willing to take her back if she proved not to be as he stated. The plaintiff bought the heifer, but no reference to the defendant's statement appeared on the plaintiff's account. The heifer yielded little milk, and in October, 1950, she died from tuberculosis. The plaintiff now claimed damages.

HELD: the defendant's statement at the sale amounted to a condition and not a mere warranty, and as condition No. 12 related only to a warranty the plaintiff was not precluded thereby from claiming damages for breach of the condition; even if the statement were merely a warranty, the defendant thereby implied that the heifer should be sold on the faith thereof to the exclusion of condition No. 12; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE NEAL at Ashford County Court, dated Feb. 5, 1951, awarding to the plaintiff damages amounting to £67 12s. 6d. for breach of an oral warranty given by the defendant at the sale by auction of a heifer. The learned judge rejected the defendant's argument that liability in respect of any such warranty was excluded by the printed conditions under which the sale took place and which were appended to the sale catalogue.

Laskey for the defendant.

Jupp for the plaintiff.

G SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The defendant is a substantial dealer in cattle, and on the relevant occasion he was offering for sale by auction a large number of Guernsey heifer cows. The catalogue describes them as tuberculin-tested Guernseys, and there is contained in the catalogue a number of conditions, including:

H " (5) All statements made either in the catalogue or by the auctioneers at the time of the sale relating to the tuberculin or any other test are to be taken as statements of fact only. No such statements shall guarantee the purchaser of an animal against loss arising through the subsequent reaction of such animal to any test administered after the sale and the vendor shall not be liable in any way should this occur . . . (12) No animal, article, or thing is sold with a 'warranty' unless specially mentioned at the time of offering, and no warranty so given shall have any legal force or effect unless the terms thereof appear on the purchaser's account."

To complete my references to the catalogue, the particular animal in question was lot No. 9, and was described by the following words: "Non-pedigree Guernsey heifer, freshly calved. Earmark".

It appears from the findings of the judge that when this animal No. 9 came into the ring to be sold it received a somewhat frigid reception owing to its unpromising appearance. No one made any bid or evinced any desire to do so. Thereupon the defendant, the seller, who was present, made certain statements. There was a dispute before the judge on the question of what had been said. According to the defendant he made no representations or statements which might be construed as such. The plaintiff said that the defendant stated that there was nothing wrong with the heifer, that he would absolutely guarantee her in every respect, and that he would be willing to take her back if she turned out not to be what he stated she was. That statement by the plaintiff was supported by two other witnesses, who added at the end of their recital the words "at any time," but, so far as that addition "at any time" is concerned, the learned judge preferred the plaintiff's account, and intimated that he thought the addition on the part of the plaintiff's son and the other witness was an exaggeration of what the defendant had said. On this vital matter it is plain that the judge rejected the defendant's denial, and in terms he stated that he accepted the evidence of the plaintiff, and, with the one small qualification which I have mentioned, that of his supporting witnesses. The defendant having given that description of his animal, the bidding was begun, and in the result the animal was knocked down to the plaintiff for £65.

We have before us the record of the milk obtained from the animal after the sale, and it is apparent that she was disappointing in her performance. For a time she appears to have yielded something in the nature of two to two and a half gallons per day, but by the middle of September the yield very substantially fell. According to his evidence, the plaintiff was a little concerned about the animal from the start, and he called in a veterinary surgeon. The veterinary surgeon then thought she was suffering from the common complaint of indigestion, and so treated her. According to the record, in the first two weeks in August her yield improved, but in September it became apparent that the animal was suffering from some disease which was far more serious than a mere gastric disorder. [HIS LORDSHIP referred to letters written by the plaintiff to the defendant the first of which, dated Sept. 21, 1950, informed the defendant that the heifer was wasting and was yielding only one gallon of milk a day. The plaintiff added that he proposed to return her. The last letter, dated Oct. 30, 1950, informed the defendant that the heifer had died. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] This animal died in October, and as the result of a post-mortem examination the cause of her death was found to be tuberculosis. To dispose of one point immediately, that does not mean that any claim could be made in this case on the basis that the animal had not been tuberculin-tested at the time of the sale. There is, indeed, before us a certificate which shows that the test was made shortly before the sale, and that a satisfactory reaction followed. The certificate would have been admissible under the Evidence Act, 1938, and, having regard to that fact and to condition No. 5, which I have read, no question can turn on the circumstance that the heifer at the date of the sale was, as the judge found, suffering substantially from tuberculosis.

The question is: Does the statement which the defendant made at the sale immediately before the bidding entitle the plaintiff now to say: "The animal was not as you stated her to be, sound in every respect, and I now take advantage of the offer you made to me and claim from you the price I paid for the animal, or equivalent damages"? The difficulty arises from the circumstance that No. 12 of the conditions, which I have already read, prima facie seems intended to render nugatory any mere warranty given at the sale. But the first answer, in my judgment, to the defence based on condition No. 12 is that, in the circumstances, this statement by the defendant was a condition. It has been said many times, and particularly in Wallis, Son & Wells v. Pratt & Haynes (1), that whether any statement is to be regarded as a condition or a warranty must depend on the intention to be properly inferred from the particular statement made. A statement that an animal is sound in every respect would, prima facie, be but a warranty, but in this case the learned judge found as a fact that the defendant went further and promised that he would take the animal back if she were no good. I use the words used by the plaintiff himself in evidence and in the letter which he wrote in September. On this matter there can be no doubt whatever that the learned judge disbelieved the defendant, and, having read the judge's note of the evidence, I am not surprised. Nor is it to be passed over without comment that when the plaintiff made the suggestions he did in his letters in September and October the defendant never chose to challenge them in any way. The defendant's statement having, therefore, included words to the effect: "If there is anything wrong I will take it back," it seems to me plain that the language he used could not have been intended merely as a warranty, for a warranty would give no right of rejection to the purchaser. The final words involve necessarily a right to the purchaser to reject, that is, to return the animal. They convert the statement, to my mind, from a warranty to a condition.

If, then, it is a condition, what would be the right of the plaintiff? Counsel for the defendant has argued forcibly that the plaintiff must at least exercise his right of rejection in due time. On Sept. 21, 1950, he plainly purported to do so. He called on the defendant to take the animal back. In my judgment, in the circumstances of the case the period between July 1, 1950, and the middle of September, 1950, would not be unreasonable. But, however that may be, it is plain also from Wallis, Son & Wells v. Pratt & Haynes (1) that a person entitled to the benefit of a condition, as was the plaintiff in this case, can turn the condition in effect into a warranty by claiming damages as for breach of warranty instead of exercising his right of rejection. By the time that this claim had been formulated the animal was dead, and the plaintiff could, in truth, do no other than claim damages, and, in my judgment, he was entitled to treat the condition to that extent as though it were a warranty. If that is right, the question still remains: Does No. 12 of the conditions apply? In my judgment, the answer is: No. Condition No. 12 is limited in its terms to a statement made which is a mere warranty and is not a condition, and the language in the second part of it, "... and no warranty so given shall have any legal force or effect ..." can only refer to the warranty previously mentioned, viz., a statement which is a warranty and no more. In other words, in my judgment, condition No. 12 cannot be relied on by the defendant to defeat the right of the plaintiff to sue for damages for the breach of the condition under which he purchased.

Since this matter is of some importance, however, I think it is desirable that I should also express a view on the conclusion properly to be reached if this statement were a warranty merely. On that aspect of the matter I derive considerable assistance from the decision of this court in Couchman v. Hill (2). That was a case of the sale of heifers under the description of "unserved." There was a special condition in the auction particulars:

"The lots are sold with all faults, imperfections, and errors of description, the auctioneers not being responsible for the correct description, genuineness, or authenticity of, or any fault or defect in, any lot, and giving no warranty whatever."

In that case, as in this, there was a certain nervousness in regard to the particular animals offered, and when they were in the ring the plaintiff, the buyer, asked both the seller and the auctioneer: "Can you confirm heifers unserved?", and both replied affirmatively to that question. It later transpired that one of the heifers so purchased was not unserved, but died from a miscarriage through the strain of carrying a calf at too young an age for breeding. The plaintiff sued for damages, and the defendant, the seller, relied, among other things, on the condition which I have read. In that case the plaintiff's question and the answer to it amounted to a warranty and no more. SCOTT, L.J., in giving the leading judgment, expressed himself thus ([1947] 1 All E.R. 105):

"The real question is: What did the parties understand by the question addressed to and the answer received from both the defendant and the auctioneer? It is contended by the defendant that the question meant 'having regard to the onerous stipulations which I know I shall have to put up with if I bid and the lot is knocked down to me, can you give me your honourable assurance that the heifers have in fact not been served? If so, I will risk the penalties of the catalogue.' The alternative meaning is: 'I am frightened of contracting on your published terms, but I will bid if you will tell me by word of mouth that you accept full responsibility for the statement in the catalogue that the heifers have not been served, or, in other words, give me a clean warranty. That is the only condition on which I will bid'."

The learned lord justice decided on the facts of that case that it was clear that the question and answer should be interpreted in the second alternative sense, and that, if that were so, the express warranty must necessarily be regarded as having overridden the printed conditions and as having formed part of the contract to the exclusion of the printed conditions. SCOTT, L.J., further said (ibid.):

"The county court judge in a careful reserved judgment has found that this oral statement was made, and he refers to it as a warranty, but holds that its value was destroyed by the qualifying stipulations. He has not in terms put the question to himself: 'Did the parties by this question and answer intend to exclude the stipulations from the contract that resulted on the fall of the hammer?'"

The learned lord justice, putting that question to himself, answered it in the way that I have indicated.

The terms of the printed conditions in the present case differ from the terms of the printed conditions in Couchman v. Hill (2), and the language used by the respective defendants differs also, but I think the matter may be put precisely and properly, as it was suggested in the course of the argument, by ROXBURGH, J. I do not re-state the facts as found by the judge, but, bearing those facts in mind, and, in particular, the initial silence which greeted the entry of this animal into the ring and the fact that bidding only began when the statement had been made, the question may properly be formulated thus: Did the defendant imply by this statement that the animal should be sold on the faith of what he stated to the exclusion of the printed clause, condition No. 12, or of any other condition which might be found in the auction particulars which would of itself appear to exclude any oral statement made? Counsel for the defendant argued that neither party may have had in mind, when this particular incident occurred, what the exact terms of the conditions of sale were, though I should suppose that, both being experienced in the buying and selling of cattle, they would be aware, according to common practice, that there would be stultifying conditions of some kind in the auction particulars. If that were the question to be posed, in my judgment, it should be answered affirmatively on the facts as found by the judge. I, therefore, would hold that, even if the language used here were a warranty only and not a condition, still the plaintiff would be entitled to succeed.

Before leaving Couchman v. Hill (2), I would like to say one further word about it. According to the report which I have, there is an editorial note referring to a much earlier case of a hundred years ago, Hopkins v. Tanqueray (3), relating to the sale of a horse at Tattersalls. In that case the seller and the buyer met, not at the sale, but the day before the sale, and the conversation which is related in this note formed no part of the transaction which occurred at the sale itself. At the meeting between the seller and the buyer a statement was made about the soundness of the horse, and later the auction took place. The question was raised whether what had passed in the conversation could affect a stultifying condition in the auction particulars. The court in Hopkins v. Tanqueray (3) found that the promise made by the seller in his private conversation formed no part of the contract which was formed as a result of the sale at the auction and comprehended the conditions set out in the auction particulars. It is plain, therefore, that that case is wholly distinguishable from Couchman v. Hill (2), and equally from this case. I say that because the note to which I have alluded suggests that, had Hopkins v. Tanqueray (3) been referred to at the time of the hearing in this court of Couchman v. Hill (2), the decision in Couchman v. Hill (2) might have been different. I do not think so, and there is no reason for suggesting that Couchman v. Hill (2) was other than rightly decided. It binds this court in any case, but I desire to express my entire concurrence with the decision in Couchman v. Hill (2). For the reasons which I have stated, therefore, it seems to me that the plaintiff's right to succeed is made good.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. I think it probable that the representation by the seller was a condition, but I propose to proceed on the assumption that it was only a warranty. I do this because it is only pleaded as a warranty. I do not think there was any implied condition of merchantable quality, because this was not a sale by description, but a sale of specific goods. The case must rest on the express oral warranty, and the question is whether it is excluded by the conditions in the catalogue. In my opinion, the law is that if a seller of goods by auction gives an express oral warranty, he cannot escape from his responsibility for it by saying that the catalogue contained an exempting clause. This was decided in Lee v. Gray (4), an unreported case in 1929 in which I was counsel, and I have refreshed my memory of it by reference to the records kept by the court. The judgment of the county court judge in that case was in these words:

"The plaintiff brings this action to recover damages for breach of warranty on the sale of a horse. If he is entitled to recover, the damages are agreed at £26. The sale was by auction on Oct. 7, 1928, the horse in question being described in the printed catalogue as a chestnut gelding 'quiet and good worker in all gears.' Those words were read out by the auctioneer before the horse was put up, and they are plain words of warranty, intended to be acted on, and in fact relied and acted on by the purchaser, who had no means by inspection of ascertaining for himself whether the definite statement as to the horse were true or false. On the evidence I find that the animal, though in many respects a good and useful farm horse, would not work in shafts, and was not quiet in them, it being practically impossible for anyone, except perhaps a man to whose handling he was specially accustomed, so to use him . . . I come without hesitation to the conclusion that in material respects the horse did not answer the description given in the catalogue and repeated from the rostrum immediately before the sale. It is, however, contended for the defendant that if the buyer had read the 'Conditions' printed elsewhere in the catalogue he ought to have realised that the representations made about the horse in that document, and emphasised by the seller's auctioneer, meant nothing, and that he must not be so foolish as to attach the least importance to them. The 'Conditions of Sale' were in fact not read by the plaintiff, nor do I for a moment suppose he would have realised their effect in the unlikely event of him reading them, but he knew that the catalogue contained some conditions, and I hold that in point of law he ignored them at his risk, and that their terms bind him. That being so, it is said for the defendant that in the absence of fraud (which is not suggested here) the conditions relieve him from any responsibility whatever for the representations made by his authority, and render the description of the horse contained in the catalogue wholly idle. That view is not one to which I am disposed to accede with undue willingness. Condition No. 4 relied on for the defence, is in these terms: 'The whole of the lots . . . shall be taken with all faults and errors of description . . .' I find myself unable to distinguish the case before me from Taylor v. Bullen (5), and the result is that the catalogue was a trap for the unwary—a trap well calculated to catch ninety-nine out of every hundred of the class of persons who attend farm sales. Authority constrains me to hold that it has successfully trapped the plaintiff. I may not construe the condition as leaving the plain words of warranty to stand, even as to things where the most cautious of bidders could not ascertain the truth by examination of the lot. I am bound to hold that there was no warranty at all. The action therefore fails and is dismissed; and though in my view there could hardly be a defence more bare of merits, I cannot punish the defendant in the matter of costs for choosing to rely on what I hold to be his rights in point of law . . ."

The buyer appealed to the Divisional Court. The appeal was heard by MACKINNON, J., and HUMPHREYS, J., on May 1, 1929, and they allowed the appeal. They held that the express oral warranty given by the auctioneer overrode the stultifying condition in the printed catalogue, and that the case was distinguished from Taylor v. Bullen (5) because there the buyer had actually signed the document containing the exempting condition.

The decision of this court in Couchman v. Hill (2) is to the same effect. Hopkins v. Tanqueray (3) is distinguishable, because there was there no warranty at all. I have before me SCOTT, L.J.'s copy of the volume of the ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS containing the report of Couchman v. Hill (2), and I see he has noted in his own handwriting:

"Hopkins v. Tanqueray (3), a case of a conversation a day before the sale, is distinguishable."

The principle which underlies these cases is that if a person wishes to exempt himself from a liability which the common law imposes on him, he can only do it by an express stipulation brought home to the party affected and assented to by him as part of the contract: see Curtis v. Chemical Cleaning & Dyeing Co., Ltd. (6). The party who is liable at law cannot escape liability by simply putting up a printed notice, or issuing a printed catalogue, containing exempting conditions. He must go further and show affirmatively that it is a contractual document and accepted as such by the party affected: see Olley v. Marlborough Court, Ltd. (7). That was not the case with this catalogue. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the statement made by the defendant became a "condition" of the contract, but, even if this were not so, I am entirely in agreement with what both the Master of the Rolls and DENNING, L.J., have said, viz., that, if the oral statement be regarded as a warranty, having regard to the circumstances in which it was given it overrode condition No. 12.

Appeal dismissed.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Devlin, JJ.),
June 4, 1951.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Previous convictions—Report in newspaper—Committal for trial.

A On an application by the applicant to the justices at the preliminary investigation of an indictable offence evidence of the applicant's previous convictions was given and was reported in certain local newspapers. Subsequently the applicant was convicted at quarter sessions.

HELD: although it was very undesirable that a newspaper should disclose such evidence, that by itself was not a ground for quashing the conviction.

B R. v. Dyson (1943) (169 L.T. 237), explained.

Case referred to:

(1) R. v. Dyson, (1943), 169 L.T. 237; 107 J.P. 178; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against conviction.

C The applicant was convicted at Surrey Quarter Sessions on two charges of larceny and was sentenced to four years' corrective training. He contended that the publication in certain newspapers of evidence of previous convictions at the preliminary hearing before justices was a ground for quashing the conviction.

J. C. D. Harington for the applicant.

The Crown was not represented.

D LYNSKEY, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. In this case the appellant, Richard Duncan Armstrong, is applying for leave to appeal against his conviction at the Surrey Quarter Sessions on two charges of larceny in a dwelling-house, for which he received a sentence of four years' corrective training. The point which has been taken by counsel for the applicant was that the fact that he had previous convictions was mentioned in the Epsom Herald and Gazette, the Surrey Advertiser, and other Surrey papers, all of which might have E been read by persons who were members of the jury at his trial.

The facts of the case were extremely clear, and, on the evidence, the jury could only come to one conclusion, namely, that the applicant was guilty of both offences. It is, however, said that when the applicant applied to the justices for bail his previous convictions were disclosed to them, and a report of those previous convictions—it is suggested, an inaccurate report—appeared in the F newspapers mentioned. It is, therefore, contended that this court must give him leave to appeal for consideration of the matter, with the idea that the conviction should be quashed. It is clear that it is the duty of the justices to inquire into the antecedents of a man who is applying to them for bail, and, if they find that he has a bad record—particularly a record which suggests that he is likely to G commit similar offences while on bail—that is a matter which they must consider before granting bail. The justices in the present case were entitled to act as they did. It is urged that the decision of this court in R. v. Dyson (1) indicates that the publication in local newspapers of information given to justices at the magistrates' court is a matter which ought to be taken into account with a view to quashing a conviction. That case, however, lays down no principle. There the court thought it proper that, in the special circumstances of that particular case, the H appeal ought to be allowed and the conviction quashed. The court did not lay down, and we do not propose to lay down, that, merely because a newspaper, either local or national, discloses evidence of a man's previous convictions given at the court, on that, and that alone, this court must quash the conviction at quarter sessions or assizes of a man who, on the evidence, is clearly guilty. So far as the publication of that information is concerned, this court has no power to compel the press, but this court agrees that it is very undesirable that such information should be given. The mere fact, however, that it is given is no ground for this court to infer either that the jurors who tried the case had read it, or, if they had read it, that they were biased against the applicant for the purpose of the trial. There is no reason here for interfering with the verdict of the jury, and the application will be dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Re Norbury ([1939] 2 All E.R. 625), applied.

By cl. 6 of his will the testator bequeathed £15,000 to his trustees on trust to transfer to C., if then living, as and when any part of his residuary estate was distributed, such a sum as bore the same proportion to £12,500 as the part distributed bore to the whole residuary estate "and in addition to raise thereout and pay the duties on the said sum." The court having held that the direction in cl. 6 to pay duties did not extend (inter alia) to Canadian and South African duties, the further question arose whether allowances to be made (a) against estate duty in respect of Canadian succession duty by virtue of the Double Taxation Relief (Estate Duty) (Canada) Order, 1946, art. 5, and (b) against the capital of personalty situate in South Africa in respect of South African succession duty enured for the benefit of C. It was established by evidence that Canadian succession duty assessed in respect of any succession under the will of the testator was payable by the successor, and that, similarly, South African succession duty was payable by the successor.

H

HELD: there being nothing in the will to displace the rule that "testamentary expenses" must be construed as excluding estate duty on foreign personalty, notwithstanding the provisions of cl. 9 of the will C. would have to bear that estate duty, and, therefore, the benefit of the allowances in respect of both the Canadian succession duty and the South African succession duty so far as referable to the bequest to C. should enure for the benefit of C., and the sums paid to him or applied in payment of duties under cl. 6 ought to be treated as paid out of assets situate in Canada or South Africa (as the case might be) in respect of which relief was accorded and the other assets of the testator in the proportions which the values (as at the date of the testator's death) of the former class of assets bore to the latter.

It was further established by evidence that Canadian succession duty and South African succession duty were each assessed at rates which varied according to the relationship of the relevant beneficiary to the testator, so that a stranger-in-blood would be charged to duty at a higher rate than e.g., the testator's children. Persons beneficially interested in the testator's residuary estate under cl. 9 of his will included a stranger-in-blood, but all others were lawful issue of the testator.

HELD: the benefit of the allowances in respect of the Canadian and South African duties referable to the residuary estate ought to be apportioned to the shares of the residuary beneficiaries, not in proportion to the amount of Canadian or South African duty borne by each beneficiary, but according to their respective interests in the residuary estate.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, (i) whether, on the true construction of the will of Sir Hugo Cunliffe-Owen, Bt., deceased, the phrase "the death duties" in cl. 7 thereof extended to duties exigible outside the United Kingdom, so as to render them payable out of the testator's residuary estate, and (ii) whether allowances to be made against estate duty in respect of Canadian succession duty and against the capital of South African personalty in respect of South African succession duty (for the purpose of ascertaining the value of such personalty for the purposes of estate duty) (a) enured to some, and, if so, what, extent for the benefit of a pecuniary legatee, and (b) ought, so far as referable to the residuary estate, to be apportioned between the shares of the beneficiaries in proportion to the amount of such foreign duty borne by them respectively or in proportion to their respective interests in the residuary estate. The relevant parts of the will appear in the judgment.

Denys B. Buckley for the plaintiff, one of the executors and trustees of the will.

E. I. Goulding for the first and ninth defendants, pecuniary legatees.

Pennycuick, K.C., and J. A. Wolfe for the second defendant, entitled to one half of the residuary estate absolutely.

Harold Christie, K.C., and Jackson Wolfe for the third, fourth and fifth defendants, interested for life in the other half of the residuary estate.

G. B. Parker for the sixth, seventh and eighth defendants, infant beneficiaries interested in the capital of the residuary estate. A

WYNN-PARRY, J.: The first question with which I propose to deal on this summons is whether the phrase "the death duties" which appears in cl. 7 of the will refers only to the United Kingdom death duties or whether it extends to foreign death duties payable in respect of foreign assets owned by the testator. B

Clause 7 is as follows:

"Subject to the provisions of cl. 6 hereof I direct that so much of the death duties payable with reference to my death in respect of all legacies whether specific or pecuniary annuities and all benefits given by this my will as shall be equal to the death duties at the rates in force at the date of this my will shall be paid and discharged out of my residuary estate." C

By cl. 6, to which cl. 7 refers, a sum of £15,000 is bequeathed by the testator to his trustees on certain trusts in favour of the defendant, John William Sholto Comber, the clause in effect providing that as the residuary estate is distributed from time to time a proportionate sum, up to a maximum of £12,500, is to be transferred to that beneficiary and the sum of £15,000 is to be held "in addition to raise thereout and pay the duties on the said sum." So the scheme was that the testator envisaged the beneficiary receiving £12,500, the remaining £2,500 being used to pay legacy duty. As has been pointed out by counsel for the infant beneficiaries, this sum of £2,500 represents the legacy duty which would have been payable if the testator had died immediately after the making of the will, namely, at the rate of twenty per cent. The only other provision in the will to which I need refer for present purposes is the opening passage of cl. 9, which recites: D

"Subject to the payment of my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the legacies and annuities given by this my will or any codicil hereto and all estate duty and succession or legacy duty payable on my real estate (including chattels real) and the duties on any legacies or annuities given free of duty by this my will or any codicil hereto I direct . . ." E

There follow directions as to the constitution and dealing with what the testator described as "my residuary estate." F

There is a rule of construction that prima facie a direction such as is found in cl. 7, by which duties are thrown on the residuary estate in exoneration of legacies, whether specific or pecuniary, is to be construed as referring only to United Kingdom death duties. That rule is stated by BENNETT, J., in Re Norbury (1), which was a simple case where a testator domiciled in England by an English will bequeathed free of duty the sum of £15,000 to his trustees on trust to pay the income to a named beneficiary whose address was given as in Berlin. It was established that under German law, as then in force, a tax known as the inheritance tax was payable by her in respect of such a legacy, and she claimed that the expression "free of duty" in the gift of the legacy to her included freedom from that inheritance tax. BENNETT, J., in a short judgment, said ([1939] 2 All E.R. 626): G

"I have been told that there is no direct authority on the question raised for decision by this summons. In Re Scott (2) the decision of the Court H of Appeal did not cover the point. An English testator is to be presumed to know something of the duties imposed by the English law both on his estate and on beneficiaries under his will when he dies, but I do not suppose that many of them know much, if anything, about death duties imposed by the laws of foreign countries. Nor do I suppose that many of them would contemplate some additional burden being imposed on their estates by a change of residence on the part of a person to whom a legacy had been given. Since there appears to be no authority, I hold that, where an English testator by an English will gives a pecuniary legacy 'free of duty,' the only duties payable out of his estate in respect of the legacy are duties imposed by English law, unless there are words in the will making it clear that duties imposed by the law of a foreign country are to be paid out of such estate."

The learned judge referred to no case other than Re Scott (2). In Re Norbury (1) the testator was dealing only with property situate, or notionally situate, in England, and there is to be noted the difference between that case and this—that in the present case the testator had a large amount of property in other countries, in particular, in South Africa, the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada. The evidence further establishes that he was actively concerned during his life with the management and administration of that property and that he concerned himself in minimising, so far as he could, the burden of taxation in the various countries, and had also concerned himself with the incidence of death duties as regards that foreign property.

In Re Quirk (3) MORTON, J., expressly approved the judgment of BENNETT, J., in Re Norbury (1), but he found that in the case before him there were particular circumstances which created a sufficient context to enable him to distinguish Re Norbury (1). There he was concerned with the will of a British subject who stated that his domicile was in England, but he was ordinarily resident in Turkey, left immovable property in France, and died in Switzerland. The question was whether a devise free of death duties of that immovable property in France resulted in duty being payable out of the estate and not by the devisee. Towards the end of his judgment, MORTON, J., thus stated the grounds on which he distinguished Re Norbury (1) ([1941] Ch. 51):

"In the first place there is the fact that at the date of the will and at the date of the testator's death there was no duty payable in respect of this land other than the 'mutation' duty. In the second place the observation of BENNETT, J., that not many English testators would 'contemplate some additional burden being imposed on their estates by a change of residence on the part of a person to whom a legacy had been given' has no application to a case such as the present, where the gift is one of an immovable property . . . In the third place, this testator was a man who, as appears from his will, was ordinarily resident in Turkey and owned real property in France. I think that he was more likely to have in mind duties payable in a foreign country than a testator who was resident in England and owned no property abroad."

I take that last passage as indicating that MORTON, J., notwithstanding the last sentence of the judgment of BENNETT, J., in Re Norbury (1), felt free to investigate the question whether, having regard to the surrounding circumstances, the scope of such a phrase as "free of all duties" was limited so as to throw on the residue only United Kingdom duties, or whether it had any wider scope. Indeed, I think that that conclusion must follow from the earlier reasoning in the short judgment of BENNETT, J., and I take the view that such a phrase as that which I have to consider may in appropriate circumstances be given a wider scope if the surrounding circumstances are sufficiently compelling, and that that is so even in the absence of express words in the will referring to duties imposed by the law of foreign countries.

Finally, I should refer to Re Frazer (4), a decision of FARWELL, J. That case concerned a testator who by his will directed his trustees out of the income of his residuary trust fund to pay to his widow such a sum as would, together with the income received by her under his marriage settlement, produce an annual income for her of £2,000, "free of all taxes (including income tax) and duties." Some time after his death his widow re-married and went to live in Kenya. She claimed that the gift in the will free of all taxes including income tax operated to throw on the testator's residuary estate the income tax payable by her in respect of the income under the law of that colony. FARWELL, J., held against that contention. He says in the course of his judgment ([1941] 2 All E.R. 159), having read the judgment of BENNETT, J., in Re Norbury (1):

"I feel a difficulty. I think that the term 'all taxes' is very wide, and prima facie certainly would include the tax imposed in respect of the income, wherever imposed, by any country in which the testator's widow happened to be living. However, that is not the conclusion to which I think I ought to come. I think that I should adopt the reasoning of BENNETT, J., in Norbury's case (1) although I am not suggesting that his decision covers this case, or is itself a decision which I am in any way bound to follow. I think that, when the testator gave his widow an income and directed that the amount of it should be calculated free of payment of all taxes, including income tax and duties, he was contemplating only such taxes and duties as were properly payable from time to time under the laws of England, and he did not contemplate or intend including . . . any duty . . . to which his widow might have become liable by reason of her change of residence after his death."

I read that passage as supporting the view which I have expressed that, notwithstanding the words at the end of the judgment of BENNETT, J., in Re Norbury (1),

"unless there are words in the will making it clear that duties imposed by the law of a foreign country are to be paid out of such estate," a wider scope to such words as are found in cl. 7 can be given if the surrounding circumstances are sufficiently compelling.

I take the view, however, that before giving to such words as "the duties" the wider scope contended for by counsel for the pecuniary legatees the court should be satisfied that the surrounding circumstances are of a really compelling nature. Here, the evidence establishes that the testator had widely spread foreign interests and had, among other activities, been concerned in obtaining advice as to how to minimise the incidence of death duties on those various assets, but, in my view, that evidence, taken by itself, is not enough to constitute such a compelling circumstance as to justify me in departing from the rule laid down by BENNETT, J., as the rule prima facie to be followed in a case like this. I think there is great force in the contention which has been put forward by counsel for the second defendant and counsel for the third, fourth and fifth defendants that had the testator desired to exonerate the beneficiaries and throw the burden of foreign death duties on the residue, nothing would have been simpler than for him to have inserted express words in his will to deal with this matter. There is another circumstance which prevents me from giving to the words "the death duties" in cl. 7 the wide scope contended for, and that emerges from the submission which was made to me by counsel for the infant beneficiaries and was based on the construction of the opening passage of cl. 9, which I have already read. It will be observed that, in that clause, the testator, having provided that subject to the payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses—which latter phrase would include estate duty on the personalty in the United Kingdom—and subject to his debts and the legacies and annuities given by his will, dealt with specific duties, namely,

"all estate duty and succession or legacy duty payable on my real estate (including chattels real) . . ."

In my view, in the context estate duty and succession or legacy duty can only mean United Kingdom estate duty and succession or legacy duty. Then, following on the phrase which I have so construed, comes the phrase

A "and the duties on any legacies or annuities given free of duty by this my will or any codicil hereto."

That is a perfectly usual and normally constructed clause. I think, in the context, the phrase "the duties on any legacies or annuities given free of duty" provides the clue to the meaning or scope of the phrase "the death duties" appearing in cl. 7. It is as if cl. 7 had been so constructed as to contain a direction

B that all the benefits given by the testator's will referred to in cl. 7 had been given free of duty. If it comes only to that, then there is even less ground than otherwise might be the case for saying that there is any context in the will which would justify any more extended meaning being given to the phrase "death duties" than must be given to it if the rule enunciated by BENNETT, J., in Re Norbury (1) is applied. For those reasons, in my view, the scope of the phrase "the death duties" in cl. 7 is limited to United Kingdom death duties.

C [HIS LORDSHIP heard argument on the remaining questions raised by the summons.]

Cur. adv. vult.

June 6. WYNN-PARRY, J., read the following judgment. A further question has been raised and argued before me, viz., what is the effect, first as between (a) Mr. Comber, on the one hand, and (b) the residuary legatees, on the other hand, and, secondly, as between (a) Miss Cunliffe-Owen, on the one hand, and (b) the other residuary legatees, on the other hand, of the provisions of the agreement of June 5, 1946, between the British and Canadian governments scheduled to the Double Taxation Relief (Estate Duty) (Canada) Order, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 1884). The duties which are the subject of this agreement are, in the United Kingdom, the estate duty imposed in Great Britain, and in Canada the succession duty imposed by Canada. The effect of art. 5 as regards English estate duty is that the Inland Revenue must allow against so much of the estate duty as is attributable to property situate in Canada a credit (not exceeding the amount of estate duty so attributable) equal to so much of the Canadian succession duty as is attributable to such property.

F I have already held that on its true construction the direction in cl. 6 of the will to pay the duties on the sum there mentioned does not extend to (inter alia) Canadian succession duty, but does extend to all other death duties wheresoever payable in reference to the death of the testator (including estate duty imposed in Great Britain) in respect of movable property situate abroad at the testator's death, which, but for that direction, would be payable by Mr. Comber, and, further, that, if and so far as the provision made for payment of these latter duties shall be insufficient to pay the same in full, they must be borne by Mr. Comber personally. As regards Canadian succession duty, the expert evidence establishes that this duty, assessed in respect of any succession under the will of a testator, is payable by the successor. No part of this duty is payable ultimately out of the residuary estate. In the case of successions to the residuary estate or any share or interest therein the Canadian succession duty thereon is payable by the individual successors as in the case of a pecuniary legacy, and, if paid by the executors, is recoverable from the individual successors. I have, therefore, already held that Canadian succession duty ought to be charged against the respective shares in the residuary estate bequeathed by cl. 9 of the will. Canadian succession duty is assessed at rates which vary (inter alia) with the relationship of the successor to the testator, and, as Miss Cunliffe-Owen was not a relation of the testator, she has had to bear Canadian succession duty at a higher rate than is exigible in the cases of the other residuary legatees, all of whom are children of the testator. In these circumstances I have to decide whether or not Mr. Comber is entitled to share in the relief accorded in respect of the testator's estate by the double taxation relief agreement to which I have referred. As between Miss Cunliffe-Owen, on the one hand, and the other residuary legatees, on the other hand, I have to decide whether any credit arising by virtue of the double taxation relief agreement, after providing for any part thereof to which Mr. Comber may be held to be entitled, enures as between the persons interested in the residuary estate according to their respective interests therein or among them in proportion to the amount of Canadian succession duty borne by them respectively.

It was argued that the phrase "testamentary expenses" includes the whole of the estate duty payable in respect of the testator's personal estate wherever situate, and for this proposition reliance was placed on the judgment of KEKEWICH, J., in Re Clemow (5). It is true that the language of the judgment appears to be wide enough to support this proposition, but it is to be observed that it does not appear from the report that any estate duty on foreign personalty was involved. In any event it cannot be doubted, since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Scull (6), following the reasoning of the House of Lords in O'Grady v. Wilmot (7), that, apart from any direction in the will to the contrary, the estate duty payable on foreign personalty is not a testamentary expense, because, as the foreign personalty does not come to the hands of the executor virtute officii, it is a charge on that personalty. Turning to cl. 9 of the will, I am unable to find any sufficient direction to displace the application of the general rule to which I have referred. It was argued that, as the testator has thrown on residue, in addition to what on its true construction is to be regarded as covered by the phrase "testamentary expenses," such further burdens as he cannot have meant to exclude the estate duty payable in respect of foreign personalty, and that, therefore, the phrase "testamentary expenses" should be given a wide meaning. I cannot accept this argument. In my view, one must approach the construction of the opening words of cl. 9 with the general rule in mind and then inquire to what extent, if at all, the testator has displaced it. On this basis one must construe the phrase "testamentary expenses" as prima facie including, as regards estate duty, only estate duty on the personalty situate in the United Kingdom. Now, when one reads further one finds that the testator has expressly thrown on residue the estate duty on free realty, but this estate duty is not a testamentary expense: Re Sharman (8). To my mind, this circumstance precludes me from holding that the phrase "testamentary expenses" should be construed as including the estate duty on foreign personalty. The result is that, in accordance with the general rule, the beneficiaries concerned will eventually bear the estate duty on the foreign personalty—Mr. Comber to the extent that I have already held, and those interested in the residuary estate the remainder.

Now, the credit which is given under the double taxation relief agreement is a credit in respect of the estate duty payable in respect of the personal estate situate in Canada, which estate duty, as I have held, will have to be borne eventually by Mr. Comber and the residuary legatees. It, therefore, follows to my mind that this credit should enure, not for the benefit of the testator's estate generally, but for the benefit of the persons who have to bear the estate duty on the Canadian personalty. So far as Mr. Comber is concerned, there will be a provision in the order that any sums paid to him under cl. 6 of the will or applied in payment of any duties under the direction to pay duties contained in that clause ought to be treated as paid out of assets of the testator's estate situate in Canada in respect of the estate duty on which double taxation relief is accorded and the other assets of the estate in the proportions which the values of these classes of assets as valued at the testator's death for the purposes of estate duty in the United Kingdom respectively bear to one another. There will be a further provision in the order that Mr. Comber is entitled as between himself and the persons interested in the residuary estate to a part of the benefit of any credit granted pursuant to the double taxation relief agreement, to which I have referred, against estate duty imposed in the United Kingdom in respect of assets of the estate situate in Canada proportionate to that part of such assets proper to be treated as applicable in payment of any sums payable under cl. 6 of the will.

There is left the question how the remainder of any such credit should be apportioned between Miss Cunliffe-Owen, on the one hand, and the remainder of the residuary legatees, on the other hand. On behalf of Miss Cunliffe-Owen it was argued that the division should be made by reference to the amount of the Canadian succession duty borne by each residuary legatee. I cannot accept this argument. I have held that in this case the residuary legatees must bear the estate duty on the Canadian personalty. They will bear this duty according to their interest in the residuary estate. I have already held that any credit given under the double taxation relief agreement is to be treated as a credit in respect of the estate duty payable in respect of the personal estate in Canada. In my view, therefore, the only logical course is to apply the benefit in the shape of any credit in the same way as the division of the burden is ascertained, that is, by reference to the respective interests of the residuary legatees in the residuary estate. There will, therefore, be a declaration in the order that the remainder of any such credit enures as between the persons interested in the residuary estate for such persons according to their respective interests therein.

The only other duty in respect of which I heard argument was South African succession duty. The position as regards this duty is different from that as regards Canadian succession duty in that there is no double taxation relief agreement covering South African succession duty. Nevertheless, the Inland Revenue, by way of concession, allow the amount exigible in respect of South African succession duty to be deducted from the value of the South African personalty, i.e., they allow that duty to be treated as a debt. According to the expert evidence, South African succession duty assessed in respect of any succession is payable by the successor and if paid by the executors is recoverable by them from the successor. No part of the duty is payable ultimately out of the residuary estate. The duty is assessed at rates varying with the relationship of the successor to the testator. The question, therefore, arises how the amount of South African succession duty allowed by way of the concession to which I have referred should be apportioned. In my judgment, the same reasoning should apply as in the case of the credit given in respect of Canadian succession duty. Mr. Comber will be entitled to share in the amount of such concession on a similar formula to that which I have earlier indicated, and the residuary legatees will be entitled to have the remainder apportioned between them according to their respective interests in the residuary estate. ♡

Legal Aid—Revocation of certificate—Revocation by court—Charge against assisted person of furnishing false information—Disclosure of information supplied to Law Society and National Assistance Board—Jurisdiction of court—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), s. 4 (6), s. 14 (1) (a)—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 11 (4).

At the hearing of her petition for divorce the wife applied to the court to revoke a legal aid certificate granted to her husband. In support of her application she called as witnesses a representative of the Law Society to produce the file containing the documents relating to the husband's application for legal aid and a representative of the National Assistance Board to produce the file containing details of his capital and income.

HELD: (i) the word "person" in s. 14 (1) (a) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, did not include the court or a judge, and, therefore, the information obtained by the Law Society in connection with the application for a legal aid certificate was prohibited from disclosure under s. 14 (1).

(ii) in determining the financial position of an applicant for legal aid under s. 4 (6) of the Act the National Assistance Board was a "committee or person" to whom information was furnished on behalf of the Law Society within s. 14 (1), and, therefore, under the provisions of that subsection the information obtained by the board also was prohibited from being disclosed.

(iii) the power of the court to revoke or discharge a legal aid certificate under reg. 11 (4) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, could only be exercised where it appeared during the hearing of a case that there had been some false disclosure or non-disclosure by the party who had been granted legal aid (semble, alternatively, the court could refer the matter to the committee which had granted the certificate); no evidence of any false disclosure or non-disclosure had been given in the course of the present case; and, accordingly, the court had no jurisdiction to revoke or discharge the certificate under the regulation.

FOR THE LEGAL AID AND ADVICE ACT, 1949, s. 1 (6), s. 4 (6), s. 14 (1) (a) and s. 17, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 18, pp. 534, 538, 550, and 552.

Case referred to:

(1) Brown v. Brown, (1951), 101 L.Jo. 315.

APPLICATION by the wife petitioner in a divorce suit under reg. 11 (4) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, to revoke the husband's legal aid certificate.

Muriel M. Gibbon for the wife.

A. E. Holdsworth for the husband.

Salmon, K.C., and A. L. Figgis for the Law Society.

H. A. P. Fisher for the National Assistance Board.

MR. COMMISSIONER GRAZEBROOK: Before I deal with the issue raised by this petition I want to refer to another matter. When the case was called on for hearing, counsel for the wife indicated that she desired to make an application under reg. 11 (4) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, for the revocation of the legal aid certificate granted to the husband on Mar. 5, 1951. Regulation 11 (4) is as follows:

"At any time during the hearing of any proceedings to which an assisted person is a party the court may, upon application by or on behalf of any other party to the proceedings or by the Law Society, consider whether the assisted person—(a) has wilfully failed to comply with any regulation as to the information to be furnished by him; or (b) in furnishing any such information has knowingly made a false statement or false representation; and on any such application the court may make an order revoking the certificate or discharging it from such date as may be appropriate and the court's decision shall be final: Provided that no order shall be made under this sub-paragraph until the assisted person has been given an opportunity to show cause why the certificate should not be discharged, or, as the case may be, revoked."

In support of that application, counsel for the wife called as a witness on a subpoena duces tecum Miss Spicer, who is a solicitor and an assistant secretary of the Law Society, and asked her to produce the file containing the documents relating to the application of the husband for a legal aid certificate. Counsel also called Mr. Kenneth Macaulay, an executive officer of the National Assistance Board, to produce the file relating to details of the husband's capital and income. Counsel for the wife indicated that she would be satisfied if she obtained the files relating to the husband's capital and income. I had the matter argued before me, not only by counsel for the wife, but also by counsel, appearing as amicus curiae, on behalf of the Law Society, by counsel representing the National Assistance Board, and by counsel for the husband.

To deal with the matter it is necessary to see how the question of granting a legal aid certificate arises. Section 1 (6) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, says:

"A person shall not be given legal aid in connection with any proceedings unless he shows that he has reasonable grounds for taking, defending or being a party thereto, and may also be refused legal aid if it appears unreasonable that he should receive it in the particular circumstances of the case."

It is clear from that section that the party applying for a certificate has to set out his case, either in defence of proceedings brought against him, or, if he is bringing proceedings, in support of the case he proposes to put before the court, and the nature of the details required appear from the forms drawn up by the Law Society. The party has also to set out the names of the witnesses who will support his case. Section 14 (1) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, provides against the disclosure of information obtained by the Law Society in such a way. It says:

"... no information furnished for the purposes of this Part of this Act to the Law Society, or to any committee or person on their behalf, in connection with the case of a person seeking or receiving legal aid or advice shall be disclosed otherwise than—(a) for the purpose of facilitating the proper performance by any person or body of persons of functions under this Part of this Act ..."

Under s. 14 (3), a penalty is imposed on any person who discloses such information.

It was argued on behalf of the wife that to deal with this matter under reg. 11 (4) the court must have before it the information that has been provided by the applicant for the legal aid certificate, that the court was included in the expression "person" in s. 14 (1) (a), and, therefore, the provision as to secrecy did not apply to a matter of this sort. I find great difficulty in interpreting the word "person" as meaning the court or a judge. The ordinary interpretation of the word would not be that it included the court or a judge, and I am confirmed in that conclusion by s. 17 (1) of the Act which provides:

"the expression 'person' does not include a body of persons corporate or unincorporate so as to authorise legal aid or advice to be given to such a body."

It is clear that the authors of the Act had in mind the necessity of defining certain expressions in the Act, and did not see fit to interpret this expression "person" as including the court or a judge. Therefore, I find myself unable to accede to the proposition that "person" here can include the court or a judge, and, in that event, there is nothing in s. 14 (1) (a) of the Act which takes the information that has been obtained by the Law Society for the purposes of a legal aid certificate out of the provisions of s. 14 (1) as regards secrecy. Accordingly, I hold that the information obtained by the Law Society in the course of the application of the husband for a legal aid certificate is prohibited from disclosure under s. 14 (1). A

Then comes the question of the information obtained by or disclosed to the National Assistance Board for the purposes of the part they have to play in the application for a legal aid certificate. Section 4 (6) says: B

"... a person's disposable income and disposable capital, and the maximum amount of his contribution to the legal aid fund in respect of any proceedings, shall be determined by the National Assistance Board, and the board may call attention to any special circumstances affecting the maximum amount of the lump sum and periodical payments which he could reasonably make on account of any contribution." C

It is clear from that that the National Assistance Board are the persons who have to deal with the question of the husband's means. For that purpose the board has to be supplied by the applicant with the details of his capital and income, and those details have to be exhaustive in accordance with the forms provided. Under s. 8 the administration of the Act is placed in the hands of the Law Society. Under reg. 5 (4) of the regulations of 1950 the local committee, who are appointed by an area committee, who, in turn, are appointed by the Law Society, can require the National Assistance Board to do various things, and from that I think it can be deduced that the board, although they may have an entirely separate existence and perform other functions, in regard to these matters come within the category of the "committee or person" to whom information is furnished within s. 14 (1) for the purposes of the administration of the Act in relation to applications for a legal aid certificate and so act as agents of the Law Society. Therefore, the information obtained by them comes within the provisions of s. 14 (1) and the information obtained by the board in the way I have indicated must not be disclosed. It seems clear to me, on the ordinary and natural interpretation of the Act and especially the provisions of s. 14 (1), that, if it were otherwise, it would be impossible to administer the Act because no party would be willing to disclose matters if they thought that they might be communicated to other persons. D E F

In the course of the argument it was submitted that, in addition to these provisions regarding secrecy under s. 14 (1), there was some sort of privilege similar to that attaching to the relationship that exists between solicitor and client. I do not think that it is necessary for me to go into that matter except to say that I have a certain amount of doubt whether there is any privilege of that sort because s. 14 (5) provides that information furnished to counsel or a solicitor is not information furnished to the Law Society, but, having regard to the view I have reached as to the provisions of s. 14 (1), it is unnecessary for me to deal with this. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the information in the possession of the Law Society and the National Assistance Board as agents for the Law Society, is prohibited from disclosure under s. 14 (1). G H

There is still the point in regard to reg. 11 (4) which provides for the court dealing with the question of the legal aid certificate. Only if during the hearing of the main matters in the case it appears to the court that there has been some non-disclosure by the party who has obtained the legal aid certificate, do I think that this court is the tribunal to deal with that matter. Indeed, the provisions of the regulation, which says that the court may consider the revocation of the certificate, rather indicate that the court can, if so minded, refer the matter back to the area committee who granted the certificate. I have come to that conclusion, having regard to the provisions of reg. 11 (3) which gives the area committee ample powers to inquire into matters relating to false statements or false representations in obtaining a legal aid certificate and to revoke a certificate if they are minded to do so, having heard further evidence or obtained further information after the certificate has been granted. In Brown v. Brown (1), when it had become apparent during the hearing of the case that the husband had not disclosed certain capital which he had, the Divisional Court adjourned consideration of the matter of the husband's means and the taking of the evidence of any witness in regard to that matter to be dealt with at a later date. The only reason that I referred to that was because it seemed to me that it clearly supported the view to which I have come as to the limited occasions on which reg. 11 (4) comes into operation. I have had no evidence disclosed to me during the hearing of the case indicating that there has been any disclosure or non-disclosure by the husband which is incorrect or false, and, therefore, the jurisdiction under reg. 11 (4) does not seem to me to arise.

Re GANSLOSER'S WILL TRUSTS. CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, AUSTRALIA AND CHINA v. CHILLINGWORTH AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), May 30, June 7, 1951.]

Will—Class gift—Time of ascertainment of class—Joint tenancy or tenancy in common—Gift of residue to “relations” of testator and his wife subject to wife's life interest.

The testator, who died without issue on Sept. 4, 1929, was a naturalised British subject within the Straits Settlements and domiciled in Italy at the time of his death. By his will, made on Apr. 15, 1929, he directed that his residuary estate should “be divided as follows videlicet one half to my wife's relations one half to my own relations but not till the death of my wife. Until then my wife shall have the unrestricted use of the income of my . . . estate.” The estate consisted entirely of personalty, partly in England and partly in Singapore. Under Italian law, on which the construction and effect of the will depended, the law operative in the Straits Settlements at the time of the testator's death applied in regard to the dispositions made by the will, and, under that law, the gifts to “relations” were to be construed in the same manner as in England before 1926. The testator's wife died on Sept. 8, 1949.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the will, the class of the wife's relations who were to take one half share of the testator's residue was to be ascertained as at the death of the testator and would consist of the persons who would have been entitled to the wife's personal estate under the Statutes of Distribution (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10, and 1 Jac. 2, c. 17) if she had died intestate in respect thereof on the day of the testator's death immediately after him and if those statutes had been applicable to the distribution of her personal estate.

(ii) the persons entitled to the half share of the residue expressed to be given to the testator's relations were to be ascertained as at the date of his death and would consist of those persons (other than the wife) who would have been entitled to his personal estate under the Statutes of Distribution (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10, and 1 Jac. 2, c. 17) if he had died intestate and the statutes had applied.

(iii) the members of each class (i.e., the wife's relations and the testator's relations) would take the share to which they were entitled as joint tenants, and not as tenants in common.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 7. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The testator, Gustav Gansloser, made his will on Apr. 15, 1929. After appointing the plaintiffs, the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China, as executors and giving certain directions not material to be here set forth, the testator continued as follows:

"The remainder of my estate wherever situated . . . I desire to be divided as follows videlicet one half to my wife's relations one half to my own relations but not till the death of my wife. Until then my wife shall have the unrestricted use of the income of my said estate."

A The testator died on Sept. 4, 1929. He left no issue. He was married once only, namely, to the wife named in his will. She married again after his death, but had no issue by either marriage. Both the testator and his wife had several collateral relations who are represented on the present summons. The will was a holograph document unwitnessed. It was, however, admitted to probate and proved in the Principal Probate Registry by the said bank on Mar. 10, 1930, as being a valid will by the laws of Italy, in which country the testator was domiciled at the date of his death. His debts and funeral expenses have long since been paid and discharged. His estate consisted wholly of personalty, partly in England and partly at Singapore. All the duties payable on his death have been discharged and also the further duties payable on his wife's death, which event occurred on Sept. 8, 1949.

C By an order made by LUXMOORE, J., on Apr. 27, 1932, in former proceedings in the matter of the testator's estate in which the bank was plaintiff and the testator's widow (who had married again and was then Elizabeth Fry) and others were defendants, it was declared: (i) that the testator was domiciled at his death in Italy; (ii) that at his death he was a naturalised D British subject within the Straits Settlements; (iii) that his will effectively disposed of all his estate wherever situate, that the construction and effect of his will depended on the law of Italy, and that under the Italian law the law operative in the Straits Settlements at his death applies. It is established by evidence in the present proceedings that under the last-mentioned law the gifts to "relations" would be construed in the same manner as in England before E 1926 and that the English authorities on the subject would be followed. On that footing I have now to determine the meaning and effect of the gifts to the relations of the testator and his wife respectively. It has long been settled that, to give a measure of certitude to the word "relations," a testamentary gift to the relations of a named person is construed as a gift to the persons who would by virtue of the relevant statute or statutes of distribution take the personal estate of that named person on his or her intestacy. This is not disputed, and it is also agreed that the relevant statutes to be looked at in the present case are those which were in force before 1926, viz., the Statute of Distribution, 1670 (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10), and the statute 1 Jac. 2, c. 17, which regulated the law of intestate succession until repealed by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925.

G It will be observed that the wife's relations are mentioned first, a point which may have some slight significance, and I will deal first with the gift to them. The question which arises at the outset is this: Is the class of her relations to be ascertained on the assumption and footing of her having died intestate at the date of the testator's death or on the assumption and footing of her having died intestate at the actual date of her own death? On either view of the matter, do the members of the class take as tenants in common in the shares in which they H would have taken under the statutes in the event of her notional intestacy, or do they take as individuals in joint tenancy? I cannot construe the direction to divide as applying further than to the original division into halves. Neither of these questions would appear to be precisely covered by authority. As to the first, however, I think that the class should be ascertained as at the death of the testator, consisting of those persons who, if the wife had died at the date of his death, would have been her statutory next of kin. There is no difficulty about the ascertainment of an artificial class on such a hypothetical and contingent footing: compare Re Mellish (1), although there the artificial class was ascertained after, and not before, the actual death. In the present case the gift to the wife's relations comes first and the life interest of the wife follows, and it seems more likely that the testator was intending to benefit such of her relations as he might be expected to have known rather than persons of whom none might have been existing in his lifetime, and, moreover, it is well settled that the court inclines to an early date of vesting: see Mortimore v. Mortimore (2).

As to the second question, I think that the members of the class take as joint tenants and not in the shares prescribed by the statutes, and this view appears to me to be supported by the authority of Eagles v. Le Breton (3) and Lucas v. Brandreth (No. 2) (4). Tiffin v. Longman (5) is rather puzzling, but the material point seems to me to be that, where we have (as here) an artificial class to be ascertained at the date of a hypothetical and not an actual death, the implied reference to the statutes should not be carried further than the ascertainment of the persons of whom the class is composed: see White v. Springett (6), per SELWYN, L.J. (4 Ch. App. 303) and Mortimore v. Mortimore (2), per EARL CAIRNS, L.C. (4 App. Cas. 451). When the gift is to next of kin and not to relations or relatives, the argument for applying the statutes for all purposes is obviously much stronger.

Though the point is, to my mind, a doubtful one, I have come to the conclusion that I should declare that, on the true construction of the testator's will and in the events which have happened, the persons entitled to the one half of the testator's residuary estate expressed in the will to be given to his wife's relations are the persons who under or by virtue of the former statutes of distribution (Statute of Distribution, 1670, and the statute 1 Jac. 2, c. 17) would have been entitled to her personal estate if she had died intestate in respect thereof on the day of the testator's death immediately after him and the said statutes had been applicable to the distribution of such personal estate, such persons to take as joint tenants and not as tenants in common.

As regards the gift to the relations of the testator, I understand that, on any view of the matter, the same persons are entitled, but I will none the less express my view and declare that, on the true construction of his will and in the events which have happened, the persons entitled to the one half of his residuary estate expressed to be given to his relations are the persons, other than his wife, who under or by virtue of the same statutes would have been entitled to his personal estate if he had died intestate in respect thereof and the said statutes had been applicable to the distribution of such personal estate, such persons to take as joint tenants and not as tenants in common. I will direct the costs of all parties taxed as between solicitor and client to be raised and retained or paid out of the capital of the testator's estate. There will be liberty to apply in case any inquiry or other further relief should be necessary.

Declaration accordingly.

THOMPSON v. EARTHY.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Roxburgh, J., sitting as a judge of the Division), June 8, 1951.]

Trespass—Deserted wife in occupation of dwelling-house—Undertaking by husband, on summons for maintenance, to allow wife and children to remain in house rent free—Conveyance by husband to plaintiff.

From their marriage in 1935 until July 25, 1946, the defendant and her husband lived together in a house which was the freehold property of the husband. On July 25, 1946, the husband deserted the defendant and the children of the marriage, leaving them in the matrimonial home while he went to live elsewhere. On Oct. 20, 1946, before a court of summary jurisdiction on a summons by the defendant for the custody of the children and maintenance, the husband undertook to allow the defendant and the children to continue to live in the matrimonial home rent free and to pay all outgoings in respect thereof. On June 17, 1950, the husband conveyed the house to the plaintiff, who thereupon sought possession of it from the defendant.

HELD: the defendant had no legal or equitable interest in the premises which ran with the premises and were capable of binding them in the hands of a purchaser, and, therefore, she was a trespasser and must deliver up possession to the plaintiff.

ACTION.

The plaintiff was the purchaser of a freehold dwelling-house which was formerly the matrimonial home of the defendant and her husband, the vendor of the property. After being deserted by her husband, the defendant and the children of the marriage continued to live in the house, and on Oct. 20, 1946, the husband gave an undertaking before a court of summary jurisdiction to allow them to remain there rent free. On June 17, 1950, the husband conveyed the house to the plaintiff, who now sought an order for possession of the property and damages against the defendant for trespass from the date of the conveyance until possession. The defendant contended that she had an equitable interest in the house by reason of the husband's undertaking before the justices, and, therefore, she was entitled to remain in possession until the husband made other provision for her.

M. R. Hoare for the plaintiff.

Jellinek for the defendant.

ROXBURGH, J.: The plaintiff, Mrs. Bertha Thompson, asks for an order for possession of the freehold house No. 15 Warley Avenue, Hayes, Middlesex, and for damages for trespass and/or use and occupation from June 17, 1950, until possession. Prior to June 17, 1950, the freehold reversion expectant on certain mortgages was vested in Vaughan Douglas Earty, the defendant's husband. On June 17, 1950, Mr. Earty conveyed the house, subject to certain mortgages, to the plaintiff, and as from that date the legal estate in fee simple, subject to the mortgages, has been vested in the plaintiff. The defendant, who is living in the house with her children, is, and was at all material times, in occupation of the premises as the wife of Mr. Earthy.

Evidence of the statements in the defence has not been given before me, but for the purposes of my judgment I propose to assume that those statements are true. The defence says that Vaughan Douglas Earthy is the defendant's husband

"(4) . . . and the said house is or has been their only matrimonial home since their marriage on Nov. 27, 1935. The defendant has lived in the said house continuously ever since her said marriage. There are three infant children of the said marriage who live and have lived with the defendant in the said house throughout their lives. (5) On July 25, 1946, the said Vaughan Douglas Earthy deserted the defendant and the said children, leaving them in the said matrimonial home and going himself to live elsewhere. The said Vaughan Douglas Earthy never returned to the said matrimonial home and remains in desertion of the defendant. (6) On Oct. 20, 1946, the Middlesex justices sitting at Uxbridge on the complaint of the defendant found that the said Vaughan Douglas Earthy had deserted the defendant and awarded the custody of the said children to the defendant, and, on the said Vaughan Douglas Earthy undertaking to allow the defendant and the said children to remain in the matrimonial home free of rent and to pay all outgoings in respect thereof, ordered him to pay to the defendant maintenance at the rate of £1 per week only and 5s. per week only for each of the said children."

After alleging those facts, the defence continues:

"Before the plaintiff acquired any beneficial interest in or title to the said house (if any, which is not admitted) she knew or by her solicitors acting for her knew of the matters [set out above]. In the premises the defendant will contend that the plaintiff's title, if any, to the said house is subject to the defendant's interest therein, whereby the defendant is entitled to remain in possession of the said house until the said Vaughan Douglas Earthy shall provide an alternative home for the defendant and the said children."

The position of a wife who remains in a matrimonial home which has been deserted by a husband is compendiously stated by DENNING, L.J., in Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (1), which was a case under the Rent Restrictions Acts. In his judgment DENNING, L.J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 825):

"If a statutory tenant goes out of occupation, leaving lodgers or sub-tenants or no one in the house, he ceases to be entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, but he does not, in my opinion, lose the protection if he goes out leaving his wife and furniture there. The reason is because the wife has a very special position in the matrimonial home. She is not the sub-tenant or licensee of the husband. It is his duty to provide a roof over her head. He is not entitled to tell her to go without seeing that she has a proper place to go to. He is not entitled to turn her out without an order of the court: see Hutchinson v. Hutchinson (2). Even if she stays there against his will, she is lawfully there, and, so long as she is lawfully there, the house remains within the Rent Acts and the landlord can only obtain possession if the conditions laid down by the Acts are satisfied."

I understand DENNING, L.J., there to be saying two separate things: (i) that the husband has a matrimonial duty to provide a roof over his wife's head, and (ii) that, as a husband cannot sue his wife in tort at common law, if he seeks to eject her he must have recourse to the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, and, if he does so, the court has a discretion.

In other words, the wife has a right to remain until an order is made against her. The husband has no right to turn her out, and the court, in considering how it ought to exercise its discretion under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, would bear in mind the matrimonial duty to which DENNING, L.J., refers.

A This, however, is not a case between husband and wife. So far as I know, there is no legal obstacle to prevent the plaintiff from bringing an action in tort against the defendant. The real question is whether or not the defendant has any legal or equitable interest in the premises which is capable of running with the premises so as to bind them in the hands of a purchaser. I have never heard of any estate or interest of this character in land, and no authority has been cited to me which suggests that there is any. The authorities which were cited suggest (though they do not decide) that there is no such estate or interest. For instance, B in Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (1) DENNING, L.J., is careful to point out ([1949] 2 All E.R. 825) that the wife "is not the sub-tenant or licensee of the husband"—I stress the word "licensee"—and in Brown v. Draper (3), another decision under the Rent Restrictions Acts, LORD GREENE, M.R., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 248):

C "In such a case the possession of the wife must, we think, be regarded as the possession of the husband . . ."

For these reasons, I should pause long before declaring the existence of a new species of equitable right hitherto never suggested, especially as the husband himself has a right to apply to the court for possession against the defendant under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, whether or not the court would exercise its discretion under the section in his favour. The plaintiff, D however, could not apply under that Act, and, therefore, if I were to invent this new equitable interest, she would be in a worse position than the defendant's husband from whom she has purchased. In these circumstances, I must decline to declare the existence of a suggested equitable interest for which there is no previous authority whatever. The plaintiff has proved her title to the land. E The defendant has proved no estate or interest, legal or equitable, in the land, and, accordingly, she is a trespasser, and I must order her to deliver up possession to the plaintiff.

G Medical Practitioner—Falsely pretending to be a registered person—Diploma of drugless therapy—Honest belief in use of title "physician"—Reasonable ground for belief—Matters for consideration by court—Medical Act, 1858 (c. 90), s. 40.

H The respondent, an African who had lived in England for two years, published an advertisement as follows: "Naturopath physician, N.D., M.R.D.P. Patients visited . . ." and gave his address. He was not a registered medical practitioner, but he had attended a course of instruction at a clinic of drugless therapy and had obtained a diploma and a certificate of membership of the British Guild of Drugless Practitioners. A charge that he wilfully and falsely used the title or description of "physician," contrary to s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858, was dismissed by the magistrate on the ground that he genuinely believed that he was entitled so to describe himself although in similar circumstances no person brought up and educated in England could reasonably have held such a belief.

HELD: a person did not commit an offence under s. 40 if he honestly believed that he was within his rights in describing himself as he did; it would not be right to say that he could not have acted honestly if he had no reasonable grounds of belief, but, in deciding whether he had acted honestly, the court must take into consideration the presence or absence of such grounds; in the present case the magistrate had done so; and, therefore, his decision must stand. CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

On Jan. 10, 1951, at West London Magistrate's Court, an information, preferred by the appellant on behalf of the Medical Defence Union, and charging that the respondent did wilfully and falsely use the title or description of "physician," contrary to s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858, was dismissed on the ground that the respondent had the honest belief that he was entitled to do so. D

Cumming-Bruce for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate before whom the respondent was charged with wilfully and falsely using the title of physician, contrary to s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858. There was a second information charging alternatively that at the same place he did wilfully and falsely use the description contrary to s. 40. E

The magistrate found that the respondent handed in the following advertisement at the South Kensington office of a weekly newspaper for publication:

"Naturopath physician, N.D., M.R.D.P. Patients visited also evening. Surgery for chiropody. For appointment." F

He gave an address. I confess that, if I had been trying the case, the fact that he used these letters "N.D." would cause me to regard his advertisement with the strongest distaste as I should have thought it was in the hope that anybody looking at it would think it was "M.D." The compositor, indeed, was so misled, because he printed it "M.D." "M.R.D.P." comes very near "M.R.C.P." G
The respondent is an African who has lived in England for about two years. He has never been a medical practitioner, but, before June, 1950 (it is stated) he had obtained the diploma of the Anglo-American Institute of Drugless Therapy. As to what drugless therapy is the magistrate does not tell us except that "he had first undergone a course of instruction which consisted partly of a correspondence course and partly of practical training. The practical training was given to the respondent at a clinic in Bournemouth, where there were about thirty beds for in-patients and an out-patients' department. The respondent attended there for six months. He then sat for examination before obtaining the said diploma, and wrote about six papers. The respondent paid £20 for his postal and practical instruction, examination and diploma. The respondent did not know whether the persons who instructed H and examined him had professional qualifications or not, and made no inquiries about the status or competence of the said institute. After the respondent had obtained the said diploma he obtained a certificate of membership of the British Guild of Drugless Practitioners."

The magistrate then says:

A "I was of opinion that the use of the title or description 'physician' in the said advertisement would constitute an offence if used wilfully and falsely by the respondent; that the respondent genuinely believed he was entitled so to entitle or describe himself; that, while no person brought up and educated in England could reasonably believe that the said course of instruction and examination by the said institute and membership of the said guild would entitle him to entitle or describe himself as 'physician,'

B the respondent, because he was an African brought up in Africa, who had only lived in England for two years, acted reasonably in believing that his said course of instruction, examination, diploma and guild membership qualified him so to entitle or describe himself."

Accordingly he dismissed the summons.

C I do not profess to understand the reasoning of the magistrate, but, as he saw the respondent and heard him cross-examined, it would be impossible for us to say that there was no evidence on which he could come to that conclusion of fact. Counsel for the appellant has invited us to say that the magistrate was bound to convict in this case because his findings amounted to a finding that the respondent had no reasonable ground for his belief, but, as I understand his

D finding, the magistrate has held that, though in similar circumstances he would not have said that a European or an Englishman had reasonable grounds for his belief, he thought that the respondent, being an African, had such reasonable grounds.

E What is the law on the subject? The books are full of cases under the Medical Act, 1858, and I express the hope that some day the General Medical Council will take steps to get another Act of Parliament which will clear up the anomalies and difficulties which the courts have found in applying the Act of 1858 to this class of case. In Younghusband v. Luftig (1) a court of five judges assembled in an endeavour to clear up what HENN COLLINS, J., in R. v. Lewis (Stipendiary Magistrate) & Frickhart. R. v. Same & Bridgwater (2) (60 J.P. at p. 393) described as a complete fog. The complete fog of which he spoke related to whether or not this question was one of law or of fact. In Younghusband v. Luftig (1), in an endeavour to give a decision which might be useful and authoritative in the future, we reviewed the whole of the cases that had been decided on this subject, beginning with Ladd v. Gould (3) in 1860, and the court came to the conclusion that the result of the unbroken line of authority was ([1949] 2 All E.R. 80)

G "... that to commit an offence a defendant must have acted wilfully and falsely and that it is for the justices to decide whether he has done so, and, also, that he must not commit an offence if he honestly believes that he was within his rights in describing himself as he did."

H In other words, the case came down to the question whether the defendant was acting in good faith in describing himself as he did because he had an honest belief that he was entitled to do so. It is perfectly true, and this is what counsel for the appellant so much relied on, that in giving the judgment of the court I went on (ibid.):

"He must, of course, have a reasonable ground for his belief. A person who has passed no examination and has received no qualification from a genuine teaching body cannot adopt one of the titles mentioned in s. 40 of the Act of 1858 and be heard to say that he believed he had such skill as would entitle him so to describe himself. We can sum up this part of the case by saying that there must be mens rea and the presence or absence of that state of mind must be tested on ordinary principles and in the light of common sense."

It is clear that what the court meant in that passage was that the magistrate must apply ordinary principles and test the matter in the light of common sense, and that, generally speaking, applying ordinary principles and in the light of common sense, he would say that, if a man had no reasonable ground for believing what he said he believed, he was not acting honestly. There may be exceptions. A man may believe that which no other man of common sense would believe, but he yet may honestly believe it. One of the matters which occurred to me in addition to those mentioned by DEVLIN, J., in the course of the argument is that in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 90, it is said:

"A thing is deemed to be done in good faith, within the meaning of this Act, where it is in fact done honestly, whether it is done negligently or not."

That section was inserted in the Act because, although that was the effect of the old cases, there came a series of cases, most of them in LORD TENTERDEN's time, in which, if a man acted negligently, it was said he could not pass a good title as he was not acting bona fide. Gross negligence or strong negligence is always evidence—very often the best evidence—that a man is not acting honestly. If he has acted without any reasonable ground and says: "I had not properly inquired, and did not think this or that," that may be (and generally is) very good evidence that he is not acting honestly. But it is only evidence, and I do not think it would be right for a moment to say that we qualified the rest of our judgment in Younghusband v. Luftig (1), in which we emphasised the fact that the question for the magistrate was whether the defendant acted honestly, by saying that he could not have acted honestly if he had no reasonable grounds. What we were pointing out was that, in considering whether he had acted honestly, the magistrate ought to take into account the presence or absence of reasonable grounds of belief. In the present case it is obvious that the magistrate did take that into account, and he has given us his reasons for coming to the conclusion that this man did act honestly. Whether we should have come to that conclusion is neither here nor there, because we cannot disturb it if there was evidence on which he could arrive at that conclusion. He saw the respondent and heard his evidence and formed an opinion as to his credibility and honesty. Having found that, I do not think the court can interfere because to do so we should be ignoring the real ratio of the judgment in Younghusband v. Luftig (1), which is that whether a person acted honestly is a question of fact for the magistrate, and whether he acted reasonably or not is the deciding feature in this case.

The only satisfactory part of the case is that I hope that the respondent will understand, now this matter has been before the court and it has been explained to him what are the requirements of the English law, that he will never be able to say that he honestly believes he is entitled to use the title of "physician" because he is holding what he is pleased to call the diploma of a body that is not recognised. If he does so, he will find himself prosecuted and dealt with severely. As it is, I think this appeal must be dismissed.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree.

DEVLIN, J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

LORT-WILLIAMS v. LORT-WILLIAMS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Hodson, L.J.J.), June 12, 1951.]

Variation of Settlement—"Post-nuptial settlement"—Life assurance policy effected for benefit of "widow or children"—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 25.

On Dec. 1, 1923, the parties were married, and on Nov. 19, 1936, the husband effected a policy of assurance on his life under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11 (as amended), the sum assured being payable to two trustees "as trustees of the moneys payable under this policy, effected for the benefit of the widow or children or any of them of the assured in such shares and proportions and interest and generally in such manner as the assured shall by will or deed revocable or irrevocable appoint or so have appointed." On Nov. 30, 1949, the wife was granted a decree of divorce, which was made absolute on Jan. 16, 1950. The wife applied under s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, to vary the settlement said to have been created by the policy, but the husband objected that the policy was not a settlement within the meaning of s. 25 of the Act of 1950, and, therefore, that the court had no jurisdiction to vary it.

HELD: "post-nuptial settlement" within the meaning of s. 25 included any provision made by a husband during the existence of the marriage for the future benefit of the wife of that marriage; it did not cease to be a settlement on her because the provision was contingent or because by its terms it might be applicable for the benefit of a wife by a subsequent marriage; and, therefore, in the present case the court had jurisdiction to vary the policy.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of WALLINGTON, J., dated May 11, 1951, whereby he confirmed the registrar's report that a life assurance policy, effected by the husband for the benefit of his widow and children during the subsistence of the marriage, was a post-nuptial settlement variable by the court under s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. For the husband it was contended that the policy was not a settlement on the wife, and, if it was, it was not a post-nuptial settlement within s. 25.

Cross, K.C., and Merrylees for the husband.

Simon, K.C., and A. H. Ormerod for the wife.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by a husband who was the respondent to his wife's petition for divorce. The marriage took place on Dec. 1, 1923, a decree nisi was granted to the wife on Nov. 30, 1949, and it was made absolute on Jan. 16, 1950.

Section 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which reproduces s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, provides as follows:

"The court may after pronouncing a decree for divorce or for nullity of marriage inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or any part of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of the parties to the marriage, as the court thinks fit, and the court may exercise the powers conferred by this section notwithstanding that there are no children of the marriage."

The wife seeks to invoke the jurisdiction of the court under that section to vary the terms of a policy of assurance which was taken out during the marriage on the husband's life. We are only concerned with the question whether that policy was a post-nuptial settlement within s. 25 and whether the registrar had jurisdiction to consider the wife's application. The learned registrar decided that he had jurisdiction. WALLINGTON, J., confirmed that decision, and the husband appeals to this court.

The policy was taken out by a Mr. Yates and a Mr. Headley on the life of Sir John Rolleston Lort-Williams. It was a single premium policy for £3,000 and profits, amounting to about £1,500. It was payable to Mr. Yates and Mr. Headley, the trustees, as

"moneys payable under this policy effected for the benefit of the widow or children or any of them of the assured in such shares and proportions and interest and generally in such manner as the assured shall by will or deed revocable or irrevocable appoint or so have appointed."

Under the heading "Special Provisions" there are the words:

"Under the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11, and [as amended by the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935] this policy is issued for No. 105768, the surrender value thereof, as at Aug. 8, 1936, being the single premium under this policy to which there attaches at the date of issue bonus additions of £747 10s. 0d. being the bonus additions which attached at the aforesaid date to policy No. 105768."

Clearly the parties thought, and I have no reason to think that they were wrong in thinking, that this policy fell within the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Section 11 of that Act provides:

"A policy of assurance effected by any man on his own life, and expressed to be for the benefit of his wife, or of his children, or of his wife and children, or any of them, or by any woman on her own life, and expressed to be for the benefit of her husband, or of her children, or of her husband and children, or any of them, shall create a trust in favour of the objects therein named, and the moneys payable under any such policy shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains unperformed, form part of the estate of the insured, or be subject to his or her debts . . ."

It will be noted that the expression in the statute is "for the benefit of his wife", and the policy in question here refers to "his widow".

In Re Browne's Policy (1) a man effected a policy under the Act of 1882, expressed to be for the benefit of his wife and children. The wife died and the man married again and had a child by his second wife. On his death it was held that the widow and her child were entitled to participate jointly with the children of the first marriage. The question there was whether the use of the word "wife" in the policy restricted the benefit to the wife existing at that time. KEKEWICH, J., said ([1903] 1 Ch. 190):

A "Regarding the case apart from the language of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, one is met by the presumption, which is rather one of common parlance and common sense than of law, though it has been recognised by legal authority, that a married man speaking of his wife intends his wife at that time, and does not contemplate one whom he may marry after her death, and the observation holds good respecting allusions by another to a given man's wife. But, in construing an instrument intended to make provision for a wife after the husband's death, this seems to lose weight, and is countervailed by the consideration that he in all probability intended to provide for her who survived him, and for that reason stood in need of the provision."

C It is interesting to contrast that case with Cousins v. Sun Life Assurance Society (2). There a husband effected policies of assurance on his life expressed to be for the benefit of his wife named therein under the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and it was held by the Court of Appeal that the wife took an immediate vested interest in the policy which passed on her death in the husband's lifetime to her personal representatives as part of her estate. In the present case the wife was not named.

D WALLINGTON, J., relied in part on the construction which he put on this document as, inter alia, a settlement on the husband, and, therefore, on one of the parties whose marriage was the subject of a decree. Counsel for the husband submits, first, that the policy was not a settlement on the husband; secondly, that it was not a settlement on the wife; and, thirdly, that, if it was a settlement, it was not a nuptial settlement. In Hargreaves v. Hargreaves (3) a settlement was made by a young man, to which his widowed mother was a party. The settlement concerned certain reversionary property of the settlor who assigned to trustees on trust, subject to the life interest of his mother, to pay the income of the property to the settlor for life and after his death on the usual trusts in favour of his children or issue as he should appoint and in default of appointment in equal shares at twenty-one or marriage. The settlement contained a power to appoint by deed to or for the benefit of any wife. The settlor was not married at that time, and, though he did marry soon afterwards, the settlement did not in its terms contemplate a particular marriage. HILL, J., held that it was not an ante-nuptial settlement within s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. He used these words ([1926] P. 45):

G "This section is dealing with ante-nuptial and post-nuptial settlements, and it refers to marriage. It refers to it because what it is dealing with is what we commonly know as a marriage settlement, that is, a settlement made in contemplation of, or because of, marriage, and with reference to the interests of married people, or their children."

H In Prinsep v. Prinsep (4) HILL, J., somewhat enlarged the test which he thought s. 192 imposed. He said ([1929] P. 232):

"Is it upon the husband in the character of husband or on the wife in the character of wife, or upon both in the character of husband and wife? If it is, it is a settlement on the parties within the meaning of the section. The particular form of it does not matter."

In Melville v. Melville and Woodward (5) it was decided by the Court of Appeal that a settlement by the wife was a post-nuptial settlement within the section.

GREER, L.J., referring to a submission of counsel for the husband in that case, said ([1930] P. 177):

"As I understand his argument it was this, that any settlement is a post-nuptial settlement, if it is a settlement during marriage by one of the parties, which gives some interest to either of the spouses or their offspring. That is a proposition which appeals to me as a fair and reasonable representation of what the section means. As I have said, it is not always wise without full consideration to say more than is necessary for the decision of the particular case before the court, and in this particular case I have no doubt whatever that this settlement of Dec. 30, 1927, was a post-nuptial settlement . . ."

ROMER, L.J. (ibid., 178) had some doubt whether the general proposition as advanced by counsel for the husband was right and was more attracted by the definition which I have read given by HILL, J., in Hargreaves v. Hargreaves (3). In Dormer (otherwise Ward) v. Ward (6) there had been a decree of nullity in favour of the wife. By a marriage settlement the husband had covenanted to pay a yearly sum and also by means of a jointure rent-charge had made provision for the wife in the event of her surviving her husband. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., having held that, although there was a decree of nullity, there was power to vary the settlement, said ([1901] P. 35):

"But there is a further objection to making an order in respect to this jointure rent-charge . . . which seems to me practically fatal—that is, that the jointure . . . could not commence till after the death of the respondent. I do not think that the court by the exercise of its powers under s. 5 [of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859] can vary the settlement by ignoring this condition. The reasons which I have given for holding that the court in the case of nullity has the power to vary the settlement by extending the connotation of the words 'marriage' and 'children' have no application to such a condition of the settlement. It may be that the court could make an order subject to the petitioner surviving Mr. Ward to take effect after his death; but, even if the court can, I do not think they ought to do so. The court might, however, give power to renew the application."

The provision, of course, was for the wife after the husband died. I do not think that that helps as to jurisdiction. The learned registrar referred to Joss v. Joss (7), which was a decision of HENN COLLINS, J., but I do not regard that as adding anything in respect of the application to the present case to what has been laid down in the other cases to which I have referred.

WALLINGTON, J., at times seemed to suggest that the position of the wife in the present case was the same as if she had been named as she was in Cousins' case (2). With respect, I do not think that would be right, but he puts the question accurately in this sentence:

"In this particular case, however, having regard to the use of the word 'widow,' would it be more accurate to say that the [husband] obtained the policy, not 'because of the marriage,' but rather because he was married and in order that he might provide some support for any woman to whom he might be married at the time of his death?"

Counsel for the husband admits that the words of s. 25 of the Act of 1950 have been given a wide meaning, but he relies on the fact that the interest of the wife was contingent in that (i) she has to survive the husband (ii) she has to survive him as his widow, and (iii) if there were children (the position might be obscure if there were not), she might take no interest at all if he appointed the whole fund to the children. I do not think that is sufficient to take the policy out of the meaning of "settlement" in this section.

On the point that this is not a nuptial settlement, counsel for the husband contended that the document did not contemplate a particular marriage, but was directed to the widow. The wife might die and subsequent wives might also die, and, in those circumstances, it could not be said to be a nuptial settlement. I do not take that view. I agree that the wife's interests under this document are contingent and uncertain for it is dependent on certain factors, but it seems to me that, this document having been taken out during the married life—undoubtedly with the object of creating a fund from which the wife might benefit subject to the exercise of the power of appointment in her favour, it is, prima facie, a nuptial settlement in respect of the marriage then existing. It does not cease to be that because it also does something else. By using the word "widow" it provides for certain other contingencies, among them the possibility of a later marriage and the husband leaving someone other than his then wife as his widow. Having regard to the words of the section, however, and applying ordinary common sense, I do not think that a settlement ceases to be a nuptial settlement—in this case a post-nuptial settlement—because in certain contingencies the wife of a subsequent marriage, if there is one, may be the person to take. That is the view I take of the application of the section to this document and I think this appeal should be dismissed. It is unnecessary to consider whether the document could be regarded also as a settlement on the husband, though I think there was force in the contentions of counsel for the husband on that point.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. The word "settlement" in s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, is not used in the conveyancing sense. It includes any provision made by a husband for the future benefit of his wife, if it proceeds on the footing of the then existing marriage. It does not cease to be a settlement on her because the provision is, not absolute, but only contingent, nor does it cease to be a settlement on her because it may in its terms also be applicable for the benefit of a wife by a subsequent marriage. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

BUDGE v. HICKS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Birkett, L.JJ.), May 1, 1951.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Exclusion of right to give counter-notice requiring the application of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (1)—Necessity to indicate statutory ground for exclusion—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 24 (1), (2)—Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 190), reg. 4.

The landlord of an agricultural holding gave his tenant the following notice to quit: "I hereby give you notice to quit* and deliver up possession of the farm-house, cottage, buildings and land known as Kingbear, Northill, which you rent of me as tenant of me on Sept. 29, 1950. The reason for this notice is that you have broken the terms of your lease by cutting timber reserved in the lease wilful damage and neglect of my property and not farming the land according to the terms of the said lease and contrary to the rules of good husbandry." The tenant purported to give a counter-notice under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (1).

HELD: while it was not indispensable, if s. 24 (1) was to be excluded, that the notice to quit should specify the paragraph of s. 24 (2) on which the landlord relied or that the precise words of the relevant paragraph should be adopted in the notice, it was necessary that the relevant paragraph should be identified therein without ambiguity, and, as it was not possible to ascertain from the notice given by the landlord which paragraph was relied on, the notice was not effective to exclude the tenant's right to give the counter-notice.

Semble: The tenant was not bound by the Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948, reg. 4, to refer to arbitration the question of the validity of the notice to quit, the regulations being in this respect permissive and not imperative.

FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1948, s. 24, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 28, p. 46.

APPEAL by the tenant of an agricultural holding from an order of His Honour JUDGE RAWLINS, made at Launceston County Court, and dated Feb. 12, 1951, by which possession of the holding was given to the landlord, the plaintiff in the action.

The learned judge held that a notice to quit given by the landlord to the tenant was effective under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (2), to exclude the tenant's right under s. 24 (1) of that Act to give a counter-notice requiring that that sub-section should apply.

L. A. Blundell for the tenant.

McCreery for the landlord.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This appeal raises a point under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24, which provides:

"(1) Where notice to quit an agricultural holding . . . is given to the tenant thereof, and not later than one month from the giving of the notice to quit the tenant serves on the landlord a counter-notice in writing requiring that this sub-section shall apply to the notice to quit, then, subject to the provisions of the next following sub-section, the notice to quit shall not have effect unless the Minister consents to the operation thereof. (2) The foregoing sub-section shall not apply where . . . (d) at the date of the giving of the notice to quit the tenant had failed to comply with a notice in writing served on him by the landlord requiring him within two months from the service of the notice to pay any rent due in respect of the agricultural holding to which the notice to quit relates, or within a reasonable time or within such reasonable period as was specified in the notice to remedy any breach by the tenant that was capable of being remedied of any term or condition of his tenancy which was not inconsistent with the fulfilment of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, and it is stated in the notice to quit that it is given by reason of the matter aforesaid; (e) at the date of the giving of the notice to quit the interest of the landlord in the agricultural holding to which the notice relates had been materially prejudiced by the commission by the tenant of a breach, which was not capable of being remedied, of any term or condition of the tenancy that was not inconsistent with the fulfilment by the tenant of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, and it is stated in the notice that it is given by reason of the matter aforesaid."

It will be seen that under sub-s. (2) (d), to exclude sub-s. (1), there must have been, first, a notice calling on the tenant to remedy, then a failure to comply with that notice, and then a notice to quit referring to the relevant facts.

The notice to quit in the present case was given in these terms:

"I hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up possession of the farm-house, cottage, buildings and land known as Kingbear, Northill, which you rent of me as tenant of me on Sept. 29, 1950. The reason for this notice is that you have broken the terms of your lease by cutting timber reserved in the lease, wilful damage and neglect of my property, and not farming the land according to the terms of the said lease and contrary to the rules of good husbandry."

A The learned county court judge held that that was a good notice for the purposes of para. (e), and from that decision the tenant appeals. The main argument below appears to have turned on the submission that the notice was bad because the words "materially prejudiced" were not inserted therein. The learned judge rejected that, and, in so far as he based himself on the principle that in a case of this kind, where the statute prescribes no form, one must not be technical and it is not necessary, for instance, to set out the exact words of the relevant section, I agree. The learned county court judge referred to a precedent for a notice under s. 24 (2) (e) in JACKSON ON AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS AND TENANT RIGHT VALUATION, 10th ed., p. 472, which included the words: "Breach of a term or condition of the tenancy being a breach not capable of being remedied." B That formula does not contain the words "materially prejudiced," but it plainly indicates that reliance is placed on para. (e) and not on para. (d). In my view, the notice ought to make it clear on which paragraph the landlord is seeking to rely. I find it unnecessary to lay down what formula or formulae in different cases would attain that end. I am not drawing precedents, but it might be argued C with success in some cases that, if the notice set out the nature of the damage, it might be so plain that it was irremediable and that the landlord's interest had been materially prejudiced that the court might hold that that was a sufficient indication that the landlord was relying on para. (e). Generally, however, I think it desirable that the indication should be more express than that. I do not regard this as a technicality, because, in my opinion, the tenant who receives D a notice and wishes to consider whether or not it is valid is entitled to know with certainty by which route the landlord is seeking to proceed. Take an example under para. (e). It may be that, although there is an irremediable breach, it would be impossible for the landlord to show that he has been materially prejudiced.

E I do not think that the notice which was given in the present case sufficiently indicates which paragraph is relied on. It refers to cutting timber, but that may be a very small matter. The landlord may not be "materially prejudiced," and the breach of the tenancy may be capable of being remedied. I do not know. An allegation of wilful damage and neglect might well cover cases in which the matter could be remedied, and so could an allegation that the land was not being F farmed according to the terms of the lease and contrary to the rules of good husbandry. The wording of both para. (d) and para. (e) contemplate that the rules of good husbandry may be broken by an act which is remediable or by an act which is irremediable. I do not think, therefore, that this notice was a good notice for the purposes of sub-s. (2).

G When the tenant received the notice he served the counter-notice contemplated by s. 24 (1). The notice to quit was good in the sense that the length of notice which is laid down by the Act was complied with. It was sent on Sept. 27 in one year to take effect at Michaelmas day the next year. I think one has to regard it as a notice which falls under the provisions* of s. 24 (1) with certain words added to explain the reason why it was served, but that does not affect its legal nature. That being so, the tenant was entitled to serve, as he did, the counter-notice:

H "Now I hereby give you notice that I require that s. 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, shall apply to the said notice and that the said notice shall not have effect unless the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries consents to its operation."

That counter-notice having been served under regulations to which I shall refer for another purpose in a moment, the landlord could have applied for the Minister's consent within a month of the date of the service. Admittedly he did not do that, so the notice to quit is invalid, and, if the landlord desires to get rid of the tenant and has grounds for proceeding, he must start again.

Another matter was raised before the county court judge which, on this view of the case, does not arise for decision, but I would like to say a word about it. It was submitted before the learned judge that the notice was sufficiently a notice under s. 24 (2) (e) to come within the words I am about to read. The county court judge held that he had no jurisdiction because it appeared to him that under the regulations made under the Act the only remedy open to a tenant who wished to dispute a notice which fell within the provisions of s. 24 (2) (b) (d) or (e) was to proceed by arbitration. Section 26 (1) of the Act of 1948 provides:

"The Minister may make regulations—(a) for requiring any question arising under sub-s. (2) of s. 24 of this Act to be determined by arbitration under this Act . . ."

Under that power the Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948, were made. In the form in which we have them the references therein are to the Agriculture Act, 1947, but it is common ground that they are applicable to s. 24 of the Act of 1948. Regulation 4 provides:

"In any case where it is stated in a notice to quit that the notice is given for one or more of the reasons specified in the next following regulation, it shall be open to the tenant, within one month from the giving of the notice to quit, to serve on the landlord a notice in writing requiring any question arising out of the reason stated in the notice to quit to be determined by arbitration under the Act of 1923."

Regulation 5 sets out in substance the provisions of paras. (b), (d) and (e) of s. 24 (2) of the Act of 1948. On this point the learned judge said:

"I am, however, of the opinion that when the Minister, under the powers vested in him under s. 26 (1) of the Act, made regulations . . . he was laying down the procedure to be followed by a tenant who was desirous of contesting, inter alia, the landlord's claim to possession under s. 24 (2) (e). It is my opinion, and I come to it with some reluctance, that once the Minister in the exercise of his powers made the regulation, the tenant's only remedy was by way of arbitration."

If I had to decide that matter and had come to the same conclusion as the learned county court judge, I do not think I would have done so with reluctance, because I think that the intention of the Act is that these technical matters with regard to breaches of good husbandry and so on should be decided, and decided rapidly, under a procedure by arbitration, by persons who are familiar with the technical points involved.

Counsel for the tenant submits that the learned county court judge was wrong and that there are no words which expressly state that arbitration is the only procedure and expressly or by necessary implication exclude the jurisdiction of the court. The words "it shall be open to the tenant" are certainly consistent with arbitration being the exclusive remedy, but I do not think the argument that the courts are not open can be based on those words. In my view, there is an absence of any clear provision making arbitration the only procedure, but, as I have said, it is not necessary for us to decide this point, and I desire to express no final conclusion on it. If, as seems to be likely, it was intended—and, perhaps, the majority of the people concerned desire—that matters of this kind should be settled by arbitration, those who are concerned with the making of these regulations and their amendment from time to time might well consider whether it would be desirable to use words which would prevent the argument put forward here being raised in future cases. For the reasons which I have given I think that this appeal must be allowed and the order for possession made by the learned county court judge set aside.

DENNING, L.J.: If the landlord of an agricultural holding wishes to give his tenant notice to quit and to rely on the provisions of s. 24 (d) or (e), he must state in the notice the reason why he requires possession, and that reason must be one of the reasons prescribed in those paragraphs. I do not think that the notice need be in any particular form, but it must at least make it clear what is the landlord's reason for giving it. In particular, when he complains of a breach of covenant which may, or may not, be capable of remedy, he must make it clear which it is, so that the tenant may know whether the notice is given in reliance on para. (d) or para. (e) of s. 24 (2) of that Act. The notice of Sept. 27, 1949, does not do that. It does not make it clear under which sub-section it comes. It is, therefore, not a good notice.

On the other point, I agree with what my Lord has said. I can well see that it is desirable that a dispute on the validity of the reason for a notice should be referred to arbitration quickly, so that the parties can know their rights without waiting until the end of the year's notice. The Minister could have made regulations to ensure a speedy determination of the matter. He could have required the question to be determined by arbitration, but, unfortunately, he did not do so. The regulations which he has made seem to make arbitration permissive and not compulsory. If the tenant has it in his option to go to arbitration or not, it may well mean that he can wait till the end of the year's notice and then dispute the validity of the reason for it in the courts. If he is to be deprived of this right, the regulations should make it clear. At present they do not do so. I agree that the appeal should be allowed on the point that the notice was invalid.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. There were two points in this case and I agree that our decision on the first point is conclusive of the appeal. It is not necessary, therefore, to express a concluded view on the second, but, in my view, they are both important points. The first was concerned with the adequacy of a notice to quit under the Act of 1948. It is plain from reading the Act how very important the designers of the legislation thought the notice to quit and its contents were, because at the conclusion of every paragraph of s. 24 (2) one finds words such as "and that fact is stated in the notice." In paras. (d) and (e), with which we are more particularly concerned, the words are "and it is stated in the notice that it is given by reason of the matter aforesaid." In the Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948, it is to be observed that reg. 5 provides:

"The preceding regulation [with regard to arbitration] shall apply where it is stated in the notice to quit that it is given for one or more of the following reasons," and then para. (d), para. (e) and para. (b) of s. 24 (2) are set out. Therefore, it is a very important matter to see what the notice contains, and I agree that it is essential that, if the notice is to be given in reliance on para. (d), that should be plainly indicated in the notice, and, if it is to be given in reliance on para. (e), that too must be indicated. I agree that, although it might be desirable, it is not essential for precise and formal language to be used specifying particular sub-sections or matters of that kind so long as the particular matter is made clear in the notice to quit without any ambiguity or dubiety. I am of the opinion, therefore, that the notice with which we are dealing was invalid on the ground that it failed to do what I think the Act of 1948 enjoins.

With regard to the other point, it is impossible to read the Act and the regulations without realising that it was intended that these matters should be dealt with by arbitration, and it is unfortunate that in s. 26 of the Act language is used which is irreconcilable with the regulations themselves. For example, s. 26 provides: "The Minister may make regulations—(a) for requiring any question arising . . ." The odd thing is that when the regulations are made that selfsame word "requiring" is used, but in rather a different context, because reg. 4 provides:

"In any case where it is stated in a notice to quit that the notice is given for one or more of the reasons specified in the next following regulation [i.e., para. (d), para. (e) or para. (b)] it shall be open to the tenant, within one month from the giving of the notice to quit, to serve on the landlord a notice in writing requiring any question arising out of the reason stated in the notice to quit to be determined by arbitration under the Act . . ."

The use of those words, "it shall be open to the tenant," certainly lends colour to the view that the tenant has a permissive power, which he may exercise if he cares to, but that it is not complete and final, and, if he fails to adopt it, he is not, therefore, utterly without remedy. On this second point I do not think it necessary to express any concluded opinion, but I share the view stated by my Lord that it would be well that this ambiguity should be removed.

Appeal allowed.

CHELSEA & WALHAM GREEN BUILDING SOCIETY v. ARMSTRONG.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), June 12, 1951.]

Deed—Registered transfer of land—Covenant with person not a party—Enforcement of covenant.

By a registered transfer, dated May 19, 1938, B. transferred a dwelling-house to A. with the consent of a building society which held a registered charge on the property. The transfer further provided: "I the said [A.] hereby covenant with the said [B.] that I will duly pay the balance of the principal interest and other monies due under the said charge in accordance therewith and indemnify the said [B.] therefrom. In consideration of the premises I the said [A.] hereby covenant with [the building society] that I shall and will repay to the society the principal sum of £438 2s. now owing on the security of the said registered charge and the interest thereon and all sums of money now due or to become due under or by virtue of such registered charge and also will perform and observe all the other covenants by the said [B.] in and by the said registered charge contained and implied And I the said [B.] apply to H.M. Chief Registrar of Land that a notice of this covenant be registered on the charges register relating to the above title." The transfer contained a testatum in the form usual in deeds, and was signed, sealed, and delivered by B. and A., the building society not being a party to the transfer. The payments to the building society having fallen into arrear, the society sought to enforce the covenant by A. to pay the principal sum and interest.

Held: the registered transfer was a deed, not inter partes, but of a nature analogous to a deed-poll, and, therefore, although the society were not a party to the transfer, they were entitled to enforce the covenant against A.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

The plaintiffs, the Chelsea and Walham Green Building Society, claimed that they were entitled to enforce against the defendant a covenant, which purported to have been made with them, contained in a registered transfer of land under seal to which they were not parties. By consent the originating summons was treated as being before the court, and a final order was made.

J. W. Mills for the plaintiffs.

K. J. T. Elphinstone for the defendant.

VAISEY, J. [after referring to the possibility that the case was provided for in s. 56 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925]: This is an action brought by the Chelsea and Walham Green Building Society, which I will call the building society, as plaintiffs, against Mr. David Anthony Armstrong, the defendant, to enforce the remedy of the building society under a mortgage dated Dec. 1, 1933, which was also registered as a charge under the Land Registration Act, 1925, on the same day. The property in question is registered land, and is known as No. 33, Pursers Cross Road, Fulham, in the county of London. The action is based on a covenant made, or expressed to be made, by the defendant in a registered transfer dated May 19, 1938. By that registered transfer, a Mrs. Brooks, having obtained the consent of the building society, who were and are the mortgagees, transferred to the defendant the land comprised in the registered title and the transfer proceeds as follows (and I quote the exact words):

"I, the said David Anthony Armstrong hereby covenant with the said Lilian Alice Brooks that I will duly pay the balance of the principal interest and other monies due under the said charge in accordance therewith and indemnify the said Lilian Alice Brooks therefrom."

There follow these words:

"In consideration of the premises I the said David Anthony Armstrong hereby covenant with the society [the building society] that I shall and will repay to the society the principal sum of £438 2s. now owing on the security of the said registered charge and the interest thereon and all sums of money now due or to become due under or by virtue of such registered charge and also will perform and observe all the other covenants by the said Lilian Alice Brooks in and by the said registered charge contained and implied And I the said Lilian Alice Brooks apply to H.M. Chief Registrar of Land that a notice of this covenant be registered on the charges register relating to the above title."

There is a proviso that nothing is to prejudice or affect the power of sale and there is a certificate that the transaction did not form part of a larger transaction so as to limit the amount of the stamp duty. There is the usual testatum:

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written."

The deed is signed, sealed and delivered both by Mrs. Brooks and by the defendant, Mr. Armstrong.

This action is brought to enforce the covenant on the part of the defendant expressly with the building society to pay the monies due under the registered charge, and it is to be noticed that the building society was no party to this transfer. The building society is, however, named as consenting to the transfer and as being the person entitled to the benefit of the covenant. The building society did not execute the deed and, although named in it, cannot be described as a party to it for those two purposes. The point which appears to be involved may be thus stated: Is the building society entitled to the benefit of the covenant by the defendant expressed to be made directly with the building society in that instrument of transfer? That appears to depend on the nature of that instrument of transfer, and, in particular, on whether it is analogous to a deed inter partes or analogous to a deed-poll. A

The old law, apart from any questions under the Land Registration Act, 1925, is stated thus in NORTON ON DEEDS, 2nd ed., p. 27: B

"The distinction between indentures and deeds poll, which is not (as is commonly supposed) the same as the distinction between deeds inter partes and deeds not inter partes, is not now of any importance . . ."

There follows a reference to the modern practice which is that deeds are no longer indented. On p. 28 there is this further statement: C

"There does, however, appear to be a distinction which is still of importance between deeds made inter partes and deeds not so made, for it is a rule of law that no person can sue on a covenant made with him in a deed made inter partes, unless he be a party to such deed, and this is the case even if he execute the deed." D

Finally, on p. 29 it is said:

"The rule [that a man cannot take advantage of a covenant in a deed to which he is not a party] never applied except to deeds inter partes; a deed poll could always be sued on by any person with whom the covenant was made, and an indenture not inter partes is for this purpose a deed poll." E

For that certain authorities are cited, including, in particular, Cooker v. Child (1), which related to a charterparty. It is sufficient, I think, to read from the headnote:

"Indenture of charter-party, not being inter partes, covenants to pay to a stranger to the deed. Debt by indenture per testat. existit." F

It was held:

"the declaration per testat. existit. well enough, though it be in debt and not in covenant, and that the action was well, though brought by him only to whom the debt is due;"

There is a later decision of Sunderland Marine Insurance Co. v. Kearney (2) G where the same conclusion was reached under a contract of marine insurance.

The question really is: What is the nature of this instrument of transfer dated May 19, 1938? First, I think it is clear that it is a deed. Then the question arises: If it is a deed, is it a deed-poll, or is it, although not a deed-poll, a deed not inter partes, or is it a deed inter partes? Normally, a deed inter partes is contemplated as a contract, or as carrying out a contract, made, so to speak, round the table by the family as a matter done, not in public, but in private. H On the other hand, a deed-poll is clearly addressed to everybody: "Know all men by these presents," or it is addressed to "all to whom these presents shall come." I incline to the view that there is all the difference between a deed made in private inter partes, between parties round the table, on the one hand, and a deed not inter partes, which may or may not be a deed-poll, but is something of quasi-public interest addressed to the whole world. This transfer does not begin with any reference to parties. It is expressed in the first person: "I, Lillian Alice Brooks" transfer the property and then: "I, the said David Anthony Armstrong hereby covenant," first, with Mrs. Brooks for indemnity, and, secondly, with the building society direct for payment. It seems to me that that is much more in form analogous to a deed-poll. It may be more accurately stated to be a deed not inter partes, although it is not strictly a deed-poll.

A Like all these Land Registry transactions, it has a quasi-public character. The entry is made in a public register. It is recorded, not for everybody to look at, but as a matter of public record in the sense that everybody concerned has a right to go and inspect what is to be found in the register.

B It may be that this ancient distinction between a deed inter partes and a deed not inter partes has the solid foundation that the deed inter partes is essentially a private arrangement whereas a deed not inter partes, and, in particular, a deed-poll, is a matter of public record and is announced, not to the whole world in the sense that everybody is concerned in it, but to those of the world who are concerned or interested in what is being done. I think that the statement which I have read from NORTON ON DEEDS, p. 29, covers the case:

C "... a deed poll could always be sued on by any person with whom the covenant was made, and an indenture not inter partes is for this purpose a deed poll."

D I have come to the conclusion that this registered transfer, effecting a transfer of the land from Mrs. Brooks to the defendant, is a deed, but I do not think that it is a deed inter partes. If that is right, it seems to me that the society are entitled to bring their action against the defendant. On Nov. 2, 1945, the defendant transferred the land to another, and in that further transfer there were covenants corresponding to those which he himself gave, i.e., covenants by the fresh transferees with him, the defendant, that they would pay the balance of the principal moneys under the registered charge and indemnify and keep indemnified him therefrom, and the new transferees covenanted in their turn with the building society that they would repay to the society the principal sum and duly discharge the obligations under the registered charge. The present defendant, having parted with the land, having taken those covenants, and having obtained that substituted covenant with the building society, now finds that he is regarded as a person more worth suing than those to whom he transferred the land, and he is naturally aggrieved to find under this transfer, which created an interest in him, but which has now ceased, that he should be asked now to carry into effect the covenant which he entered into in 1938. The only defence to this action is that, as the society were not named as parties in the registered transfer of May 19, 1938, they are not entitled to sue under the covenant, apparently made with them by the defendant. I have to overrule that objection. It seems to me, although this is a procedure summons, that the best course to take would be to treat the originating summons itself as before me and grant the relief for which G that summons asks.

Order accordingly.

R. v. CHRIST.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Devlin, JJ.),
June 11, 1951.]

Criminal Law—Larceny—Alternative charge of receiving—Case of larceny or nothing—Direction to the jury. A

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, Leonard Edward Ernest Christ, was convicted at Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions of receiving and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. He was indicted with another man for stealing lead and there was an alternative count for receiving. Evidence was given for the prosecution that the two men were seen close to a house which had been broken into, pulling a parcel which, it was found later, contained stolen lead. In summing up the chairman told the jury that, if the police evidence was accepted, it was a case in which the men had been caught red-handed in the act of stealing, but, nevertheless, the count for receiving was left to the jury who acquitted both men on the charge of larceny and convicted the appellant of receiving, disagreeing with regard to his co-defendant. The ground of appeal was that the jury had been misdirected as to the charge of receiving. B C D. Fairbairn for the appellant.

Edward Clarke for the Crown.

DEVLIN, J., delivered the judgment of the court in which he stated the facts and continued: It is impossible to believe that the jury could have accepted the evidence of the police, on which alone they would be justified in convicting the appellant of receiving, and at the same time refused to accept that evidence on the charge of larceny. In the judgment of this court, therefore, the verdict must be regarded as a perverse one, that is to say, at which the jury, if they had correctly appreciated the issues which they had to try, could not reasonably have arrived. Accordingly, the conviction must be quashed. D E

We desire to add this. In many cases, "when a man is found in possession of property or has been seen to be associated with property, it is uncertain whether the evidence for the prosecution will ultimately satisfy the jury that he was guilty of stealing it or of receiving it." Therefore, the indictment charges both counts, though they must necessarily be alternative counts. It may well be, even in such a case as this, desirable that the two counts should be opened to the jury because it is conceivable that the defence may take such a turn as may make the count for receiving one which the jury ought to consider. But, once it becomes apparent at the end of the evidence and after counsel have addressed the jury, as plainly it did in this case, that it is a case of larceny or nothing, we think that in his summing up the judge should put simply to the jury the count of larceny and remove from their consideration the alternative count for receiving. Had that been done in the present case, there would have been no possibility of any confusion. It would much simplify matters for the consideration of a jury in this type of case if, as soon as it becomes apparent what the real charge must be on which they must convict, if they are going to convict at all, that charge alone is left to the jury. JARMAN v. LAMBERT AND COOKE (CONTRACTORS), LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 7, 8, 1951.]

Document—Admissibility in evidence—"Statement made . . . when proceedings . . . anticipated"—Statement by injured man in respect of accident occurring in course of employment—Statement made to approved society, on form supplied by society, for purpose of claiming disablement benefit under Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925—Subsequent proceedings against third party for damages for negligence—Evidence Act, 1938 (c. 28), s. 1 (3).

On Oct. 11, 1947, J. met with an accident during the course of his employment. On Nov. 11, 1947, he filled in a form supplied by an approved society to enable the society to make a claim on his behalf in respect of his disablement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. In answer to questions on the form he stated (inter alia) that the accident was caused by his catching the heel of his boot on the stump of a post, that he blamed no one for the accident, that he had not taken any proceedings to enforce his claim, and that he did not propose to instruct any solicitor to make a claim or to take proceedings on his behalf. The injury deteriorated seriously and in the following week his left leg had to be amputated. In January, 1948, his solicitor informed the employers that J. would no longer accept compensation under the Act of 1925 as it was now thought that his proper claim was at common law for negligence against the defendants who were responsible for leaving the stump in the ground. In June, 1948, proceedings were started against the defendants. On July 25, 1949, J. died, and by an order made in December, 1949, his widow and administratrix was substituted as plaintiff in the action. To enable her to prove how the accident occurred, she applied for an order admitting the form signed by J. on Nov. 11, 1947, as evidence at the trial under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), but her application was resisted by the defendants on the ground that the statement made by J. in that document was made "at a time when proceedings were . . . anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish," within s. 1 (3) of the Act.

HELD: "proceedings were . . . anticipated" within the meaning of s. 1 (3) of the Act of 1938 when they were regarded as likely, or, at the most, as reasonably probable; in the circumstances and having regard to the nature and contents of the document of Nov. 11, 1947, proceedings were not "anticipated," within the meaning of the sub-section, by anyone when the statement in the document was made; and, therefore, the document was admissible under s. 1 (1).

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of McNAIR, J., made in chambers and dated May 11, 1951, affirming an order of Master HARWOOD, dated Dec. 21, 1950, refusing an application by the plaintiff for an order that a document signed by her deceased husband, being a declaration by him in respect of an accident which he had suffered and which gave rise to the proceedings, be produced at the trial as evidence of the accident under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (1).

The document was a form supplied by an approved society and completed by the deceased on Nov. 11, 1947, for the purpose of a claim for disablement benefit under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. Later, the deceased refused to accept further compensation under the Act and commenced proceedings against the defendants (who were not his former employers), to whose negligence he attributed the accident. On his death before the action came to trial, his widow was substituted as plaintiff, and she made the application so as to be able to prove the circumstances of the accident. The defendants contended that the document was not admissible, as it was a statement made when proceedings were anticipated, within s. 1 (3) of the Act of 1938. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This appeal has involved a question of interest and importance regarding the effect of the Evidence Act, 1938. At 11 a.m. on Oct. 11, 1947, Mr. David Henry Jarman, who was a road sweeper in the service of the Middlesex County Council, appears to have met with an accident to his foot by striking, or catching, the heel of his boot on the stump of a post on Stanmore Common while emptying his barrow, and the injury quickly turned somewhat serious. On Nov. 11, 1947, he filled in a form supplied to him by the National Amalgamated Approved Society for the purpose of making a claim, through the society, for disablement benefit under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The claim was conceded from the start. The injury deteriorated seriously. In the following week his left leg had to be amputated, and in June, 1949, his right leg also had to be amputated. On July 25 he died. In January, 1948, Mr. Kasler, the solicitor representing Mr. Jarman, and after his death his wife in the present proceedings, wrote to the Middlesex County Council saying that he now thought that his client's proper claim was against the defendants in the present proceedings at common law for negligence for having been responsible for leaving the obstruction on the common, and, therefore, his client would no longer accept compensation under the Act. The present proceedings were started against the defendants, who were alleged to have been negligent, in June, 1948, but Mr. Jarman, the plaintiff in the proceedings, died before the matter could come to trial. By an order, dated December, 1949, Mrs. Jarman, the widow and administratrix of the injured man, was substituted as plaintiff, so that the action is now one between Mrs. Jarman and the defendants based on the negligence of the latter in regard to the stump.

In that state of affairs a question of difficulty confronts the plaintiff, because, if she is to succeed, it is plain that she must somehow prove how the accident occurred, and it is to assist her in that matter that the present application is made. The plaintiff seeks an order admitting, subject to the other terms of the Act of 1938, the form signed by Mr. Jarman on Nov. 11, 1947. It is contended on her behalf that the form is a statement within the scope of s. 1 (1) of the Act and not excluded by s. 1 (3). In particular, it is contended that it is not excluded under the sub-section on the ground that when the statement was made

G

"... proceedings were pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish."

The short question which this court has to determine is whether, in truth, proceedings were "anticipated" of the character named in s. 1 (3) at the time when the statement was made.

H

The Act, by s. 1 (1) provides:

"In any civil proceedings where direct oral evidence of a fact would be admissible, any statement made by a person in a document and tending to establish that fact shall, on production of the original document, be admissible as evidence of that fact if the following conditions are satisfied, that is to say—(i) if the maker of the statement . . . (a) had personal knowledge of the matters dealt with by the statement . . . and (ii) if the maker of the statement is called as a witness in the proceedings . . . ” with the proviso that condition (ii) need not be satisfied if, among other things, the maker of the statement is at the material time dead. The form signed by Mr. Jarman admittedly falls within the language of s. 1 (1), tending, as it does, to prove the fact that the accident in question did occur, and it was obviously made by a person who was qualified by personal knowledge to give evidence of that fact and, if living and available as a witness, could have given such evidence orally. Then comes the qualifying proviso in s. 1 (3):

“ Nothing in this section shall render admissible as evidence any statement made by a person interested at a time when proceedings were pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish.”

Section 2 (1) provides:

“ In estimating the weight, if any, to be attached to a statement rendered admissible as evidence by this Act, regard shall be had to all the circumstances from which any inference can reasonably be drawn as to the accuracy or otherwise of the statement, and in particular . . . to the question whether or not the maker of the statement had any incentive to conceal or misrepresent facts.”

As a general premise to his argument, counsel for the defendants pointed out to us that the Act of 1938 might be regarded as a serious innovation, and that the court, therefore, should be astute to see that only such documents were to be admitted in pursuance of it as were, as he said, “ free, so far as could be possible, from every risk of bias,” and he referred to the language of GODDARD, L.J., in Robinson v. Stern (1). In that case GODDARD, L.J., cited ([1939] 2 All E.R. 687) the well-known statement of LORD ELDON, L.C. (13 Ves. 514) in Whitelocke v. Baker (2), in regard to the admission of documentary evidence, that such documents “ . . . are admitted upon the principle, that they are the natural effusions of a party, who must know the truth; and who speaks upon an occasion, when his mind stands in an even position, without any temptation to exceed or fall short of the truth.”

On those grounds counsel for the defendants has asked us to give a somewhat cautious, if not narrow, effect to the enabling provisions of the Act. For myself, I am unable to accept that premise. When income tax was first introduced into this country by statute, it was, no doubt, regarded as a serious innovation, but it does not seem to me to be the duty or the function of this court, on that account, to give the construction of a statute other than the ordinary and proper meaning of the language which the legislature sees fit to use. Section 2 (1) shows that the legislature must clearly have contemplated that under the Act documents might come to be admitted, and might be properly admissible, which did not have that impartiality to which LORD ELDON, L.C., alluded, and, therefore, it was emphatic in stating that admission was one thing, but the weight to be attached to the document when admitted was another. The legislature, no doubt, was content to rely on the experience of the judges not to give to a document, which might in a measure be tendentious, any more weight than it justly deserved. I, therefore, think that this matter must be determined according to the ordinary sense of s. 1 (3), and by asking and answering the question at the time when the form was filled up: Can it be said that proceedings were anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish?

There has been a number of cases before the court in which a different question arose, viz., whether the maker of the statement should be regarded as interested. No such question arises in this case. Beyond a peradventure, Mr. Jarman was interested when he made the statement. Robinson v. Stern (1) is the only authority which has been brought to our attention where the question was: Were proceedings anticipated within the meaning of s. 1 (3) so as to disqualify the document tendered as evidence?

In the case now before us, the learned judge, affirming the view taken by the master, thought that an affirmative answer should be given to that essential question and, therefore, excluded the document. With all respect to him, I have come to a different conclusion. As an ordinary matter of English, it seems to me, putting it for the moment quite generally and broadly, that, when the form was signed (i.e., when the statement was made by Mr. Jarman), proceedings, either by himself or by anybody else, were not "anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish." Proceedings in a case of this character might, obviously, be of more than one kind. Proceedings might, in such a case, be anticipated if it was thought that a claim might arise, and be disputed, for liability at common law or under contract. That is one class of case, and those are the proceedings which are now pending in this action. Another and different class of proceedings might be proceedings to enforce the right of the workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. No such proceedings in this matter have been instituted, but the form was filled in so as to support a claim for compensation under the Act. Plainly, in all such cases where that essential question is put to the court, the court has to answer at a later date what was the state of mind of the relevant person at the former date, viz., when the statement was made. All that I have just said leads to this observation, which I think is pertinent. I think that the court is entitled to come to its conclusion on the facts on the past date, paying due regard, though not more than due regard, to the facts as they have occurred since—particularly, by way of example, if it appears afterwards that the claim was from the start a perfectly genuine one. In that case, it may throw some light on the problem presented: Were proceedings anticipated when that claim, now known to be genuine, was originally made?

Before I pass from s. 1 (3), I should like to say a word in regard to the meaning of the expression "proceedings were . . . anticipated." The liking which many persons appear to have for the use of words having twice as many syllables as the more natural and proper word to use, has, in fairly recent times, led, undoubtedly, to the use of the word "anticipate" when the correct word is "expect." It is known to all of us that, in ordinary conversation, the word "anticipate" is used when "expect" is meant. For example, a man will say, or will more often write: "I anticipate having the pleasure of meeting you next Tuesday," when he means, more briefly and more appropriately: "I shall see you next Tuesday," or, perhaps a little more fulsomely, "I expect to see you next Tuesday." According to the SHORTER OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY, the modern use of the word "anticipate" (for it can no longer be regarded as misuse of the word) is in the sense, "to look for (an uncertain event) as certain." The example given is: "Those, not in the secret, anticipated an acquittal." If that is the meaning of the word, then, when s. 1 (3) of the Act of 1938 says "proceedings were . . . anticipated," it should mean "proceedings were regarded as certain." I think, however (particularly in view of the observations of this court in Robinson v. Stern (1)) that that is now too narrow a meaning to give to this word. I suppose it is the result of misusing, or of giving a new use to, a word that it is a long time before the misuse, or new use, acquires a precise significance. I am prepared to accept the view (for which some authority is found in Robinson v. Stern (1)) that by "proceedings were anticipated" is meant "proceedings were regarded as likely," or "as reasonably probable."

Even so, however, and giving so much latitude in favour of counsel for the defendants, I do not think that the test was here satisfied. What was the form? It was a form supplied by the approved society to the injured man, Mr. Jarman, to enable him to formulate the claim which, if what he was saying was true, he had as of right against his employers. It was a printed form, and it asked the questions which would have to be asked, viz., the nature of the injury, when it occurred, and the place where it occurred. Then comes question No. 4:

“(a) Describe fully the accident, and what you were doing at the time.

(b) Whether the same occurred during your employment. (c) Names and addresses of witnesses. (It is of the utmost importance to give names and addresses of witnesses).”

In answer to those questions Mr. Jarman put: “(a) Caught heel of boot in stump of post while emptying barrow”—I used that actual phrase in describing the accident, because I do not want to prejudice in any way what may be the answer to this action—“(b) Yes [i.e., it occurred during his employment].

(c) Working alone.” Lower on the form is the question:

“Names and addresses of person or persons you blame for the accident . . . and why?”

In answer to that Mr. Jarman wrote: “None.” In view of that answer, as far as I can see on the facts of this particular case, it becomes impossible to say that he, or anyone else, thought proceedings at common law for negligence against some third party likely, or even possible. Under question No. 11 are the following questions and Mr. Jarman’s answers:

“(a) Q.—Have you taken proceedings to enforce your claim? If so, give name and address of solicitor or trade union acting for you. A.—No.

“(b) Q.—If not, please state the name and address of any solicitor you propose to instruct. A.—No [which I take to mean, ‘I do not propose to instruct any solicitor to make a claim, or to take proceedings to enforce the claim’].

“(c) Q.—If none, do you authorise the society to give notice of your accident, and claim compensation on your behalf? If not, give reason for refusal. A.—Yes.”

At the end there is a statement that the society reserves the right to decline to act on any authority given, and there is a declaration signed by Mr. Jarman which thereby made the document his statement:

“I declare that the foregoing particulars are true in every respect, and I have made full disclosure of all material facts.”

Having regard to the contents and the nature of the document, I ask again: Can it be said, using the English language in its ordinary sense, that proceedings were regarded as likely, or reasonably probable, by Mr. Jarman, or by anyone else, involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish at the time that statement was made? Applying the ordinary standards of common sense, I think the answer is: No. Whether the proceedings would have to be “anticipated” by the person making the statement, or by other persons, it is not necessary to consider in this case. If they were not anticipated by Mr. Jarman, it is a little difficult to see by whom else they could have been anticipated, but I state again that, in my judgment, they were not “anticipated” within the meaning of the sub-section by anyone when that statement was made.

Robinson v. Stern (1) deserves a little closer attention. In that case the defendant injured a boy by knocking him down with her motor car. After the accident, she made a statement at the police station at the suggestion, according to her, of a police constable who appeared on the scene. The statement, which is fully set out in the judgment of SCOTT, L.J. ([1939] 2 All E.R. 684), opens, as these statements normally do, with a declaration that she has received a caution which is commonly given, and which includes the phrase

“ . . . whatever you say will be taken down in writing and may be given in evidence.”

At a later stage proceedings were brought against her on the ground that the accident was her responsibility, and the question arose whether that statement could be put in under s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1938. The learned judge admitted it, and since (as he said) the document influenced him in favour of the defendant, he came to a conclusion in the action against the plaintiff's claim. There was an appeal, and the matter which was debated was whether that document, on which the judge admittedly founded himself, ought to have been admitted. This court held that it was inadmissible. But, to my mind, it is plain that on the facts of that case the court, and, particularly, the majority, SCOTT, L.J., and CLAUSON, L.J., came to their conclusion on the ground that, in the language of SCOTT, L.J. (ibid., 685), it was "impossible for the defendant to say that proceedings were not anticipated." SCOTT, L.J., went on to say (ibid.):

"I cannot help thinking that necessarily the word 'anticipated' should be construed as including 'likely,' but, even assuming that the word 'anticipated' should be given the interpretation of 'anticipated by the person making the statement,' in my view, it is quite impossible to contend that this defendant did not anticipate proceedings, having regard to the facts of the case and to the further internal evidence of the statement itself, with its initial questions and statements . . ."

CLAUSON, L.J., said (ibid., 686):

"I think her answer [to a question put by the learned judge in the court] that she had not thought about proceedings at that moment [i.e., when the police constable invited her to the police station] was almost certainly entirely true. However, when she gets to the station, and she has time for reflection, she makes a statement which, to my mind, could not possibly have been made by anybody who had not present to her mind the possibility, at least, of proceedings of some character."

CLAUSON, L.J., thought that "anticipate" means having present to your mind the mere possibility. I am not sure that I am prepared, as at present advised, to go as far as he did in that passage, but I think the ratio decidendi of that case is plainly this. When a street accident occurs, as all the world knows, proceedings are, to say the least, likely. I put the question to counsel for the defendants, and he answered me that with his experience he would say that in such circumstances anyone today would state that the odds on proceedings of some sort being taken were very long indeed. The reference in the statement itself to the fact that it may be given in evidence emphasises the same point, viz., that it is something which could be used in proceedings, and, indeed, which could, in a sense, serve hardly any other purpose than to be so used.

The present case seems to be essentially of a wholly different character. A claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, was in the nature of an insurance claim. I think that the statement in the case now before us is fairly comparable to the sort of form an insured person fills up in the ordinary way when he is going to make a claim on his insurer. A man suffers (say) a loss by burglary, and he fills in a form and sends it to his insurers stating that he has had the loss, specifying it, and making his claim. Particularly where, as is found to be the fact here, it is a genuine claim, it seems to me beyond reason to suggest that everyone who puts forward such a claim must be taken to be "anticipating" proceedings of the character specified when he makes the statement. Therefore, treating this case, as all cases in this court must be treated, as falling to be determined according to its particular facts and paying regard to the particular form of the notice, I think that it is wholly distinct on its facts from Robinson v. Stern (1). I do not forget the passages in the parts of the form which refer to addresses of witnesses and to the instructing of solicitors, but, reading the document as a whole with all the answers as they were given, I cannot myself conclude from the fact that those questions were asked, and still less from the answers which were given to them, that Mr. Jarman, or the society, or anyone else, could possibly be said to have "anticipated" proceedings when the statement was made. For these reasons, and with all respect to McNAIR, J., I think that this appeal should be allowed, and that this document is, subject, of course, to the other conditions of the Act, admissible.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. To exclude this document, it is not sufficient for the defendants to say that proceedings might have been, or ought to have been, anticipated. They must go further and show that proceedings were, in fact, anticipated. Anticipation is a state of mind whereby someone considers that something is likely to happen. There must be a likelihood of the thing happening. Someone must consider it likely that proceedings will take place, and that someone must ordinarily be the person who makes the statement, for it is his state of mind which is material. His statement is to be excluded if he is a person interested and makes it with a view to proceedings. If his state of mind is such that he says to himself: "It looks to me as if this will end up in court. I must be careful what I say," then proceedings are anticipated and the statement is inadmissible. If, however, his state of mind is such that he only says to himself: "I do not know whether this will end up in court or not. It may or may not do so, but I am not going to anticipate it will. I will give my version for what it is worth," then proceedings are not anticipated, and the statement is admissible. In support of this view, I would mention that the words "pending" or "anticipated" are the words habitually used in connection with legal professional privilege. That privilege only obtains if litigation is "pending or anticipated," and in that connection it is well settled that a mere vague apprehension of litigation generally is not sufficient: see the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1950, p. 499. Robinson v. Stern (1) is clearly distinguishable, because, once a person has been cautioned by the police, he must be taken to know that the matter may end up in court. The caution tells him so.

Counsel for the defendants urged that we should give a restrictive interpretation to the Act of 1938. I agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., that that would be a wrong approach. I think that it should be given a liberal interpretation. The admission of signed statements can effect a great saving of costs, especially in cases where there is no reason to doubt the truth of what they contain, and there is no need for cross-examination. Even in cases where one party or the other disputes the accuracy of a signed statement, it can be of great value, because it may enable justice to be done which might otherwise fail for want of evidence, as when the person who made the statement is dead. Signed statements are also very valuable in accident cases when they are taken shortly after the accident, because they form a contemporary record made while the facts were still in the mind of the witness and enable the court to check his subsequent recollection. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

HODSON, L.J.: The question is whether the statement in this case was made by a person interested at the time when proceedings were anticipated. There is no dispute that the statement was made by a person interested, and the difficulty is to decide exactly what is meant by the word "anticipated." I think it is right to accept the meaning put on that word by SCOTT, L.J., in Robinson v. Stern (1), when he said ([1939] 2 All E.R. 685) that he thought that the word "anticipated" should be construed as including "likely." Translating the word "anticipated" into "likely," I think, for the reasons which have already been given, that this statement is admissible on the footing that proceedings were not likely at the time when the statement came into existence, which is the time to which attention must be directed. In my judgment, the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

TIGER AND ANOTHER v. BARCLAYS BANK, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Finnemore, J.), June 7, 8, 1951.]

Executors and Administrators—Renunciation of probate—Release from liability in respect of estate.

In an action in the Probate Division for the revocation of the grant of probate of a will a compromise was reached whereby the defendants, the executors of the will, renounced probate and the plaintiffs, two of the residuary legatees, undertook to apply for letters of administration with the will annexed. In the present action the plaintiffs sought an order for the delivery to them by the defendants of all documents relating to the estate in their possession, but the defendants claimed that they were first entitled to a formal release from all liability in respect of the estate.

HELD: the defendants were not entitled to a release.

ACTION for the delivery up of all documents in the possession or power of the defendants relating to the administration of the estate of a testator.

The testator executed two wills, one on June 2, 1933, and the other on Oct. 14, 1942, in both of which the defendants were named as executors. In November, 1942, the testator executed a codicil to the will of 1942. On Sept. 6, 1943, the testator died, and in November, 1949, proceedings in the Probate Division of the High Court between the plaintiffs, Dr. Tiger and Mrs. Haider, residuary legatees under the will of 1942, and the defendants, in which the plaintiffs claimed an order for the revocation of the grant to the defendants of probate of the will, were compromised on terms, inter alia, that the defendants should renounce probate and that the plaintiffs should apply for letters of administration with the will and codicil of 1942 annexed. The defendants renounced probate, and, on Jan. 26, 1950, letters of administration were granted to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs contended that the defendants were under an obligation to hand over to them all documents connected with the administration of the estate, either as an implied term of the compromise agreement or on the ground that, having renounced probate, they had no right to retain possession of them as against the administrators. The defendants were prepared to hand over the documents, but they claimed that they were entitled to a formal release and discharge from all liability in connection with the estate.

Platts-Mills for the plaintiffs.

Lindner for the defendants.

FINNEMORE, J., stated the facts, found as a fact that it was an implied term of the compromise agreement that the defendants should deliver up the documents connected with the administration of the estate to the plaintiffs and that there was no implied term for the granting by the plaintiffs of a formal release, and continued: Counsel for the plaintiffs contends that, quite apart from any agreement, the defendants have no answer to this claim. He says that the defendants are in possession of documents which belong to the administrators of the estate, that they are no longer executors because they renounced probate, and that they have no right as against the administrators to make any terms as to handing over the documents. Counsel referred to the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 5 and s. 7, in support of this view. Section 5 provides that, where a person appointed executor by a will renounces probate of the will,

"... his rights in respect of the executorship shall wholly cease, and the representation to the testator and the administration of his real and personal estate shall devolve and be committed in like manner as if that person had not been appointed executor."

By s. 7 (4) it is provided:

A "Every person in the chain of representation to a testator—(a) has the same rights ... as the original executor would have had if living; and (b) is, to the extent to which the estate ... has come to his hands, answerable as if he were an original executor."

Counsel contends that the defendants, having renounced probate, are complete strangers to the administration of the estate and must hand over the property which belongs to the estate. The defendants, on the other hand, say: "We are entitled to be protected. You have accepted us and before we hand over to other administrators we are entitled to formal release."

B Reference has been made to LEWIN ON TRUSTS, UNDERHILL'S LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES and HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, and I do not think that counsel for the defendants disagrees with the proposition that where a trustee hands over to another trustee he is not entitled to a formal release from the trusteeship. C Counsel for the plaintiffs considers it doubtful whether in the circumstances a trustee would be entitled to a release even if the estate were being wound-up altogether, but, in any event, the only person who can give, or is called on to give, a formal release to a trustee is a beneficiary when the whole trust is brought to an end. The plaintiffs act not only for themselves, but for any beneficiary under the will. If, therefore, they were to give the defendants a complete and formal release from any responsibility that they may have incurred while they were executors and it turns out that something illegal has been done, the plaintiffs might be in a very difficult position if a beneficiary claimed that this had interfered with his right.

D Re Cater's Trusts (No. 2) (1) and Cobbett v. Clutton (2) show as a general principle that the courts are slow to say that a formal release can be insisted on. E Counsel for the defendants agreed that he had to show that there was an end of the trust under which the defendants acted and that a new trust had been created. Having shown that, he submitted that the defendants were entitled to say: "We have completed our trust under the will and a new one has come into existence under the compromise agreement, and as ours is completely finished we are entitled to the release for which we are asking." He said that the trusts of the defendants F had been brought to an end by the act of the beneficiaries in making the agreement, and, therefore, the release which is demanded is as though it was from the beneficiaries on the completion of the trust. Counsel admitted that there was no direct authority for that proposition and I do not accept it. It cannot possibly be said that, because of these terms of compromise, the trust under the will had come to an end and some kind of new trust under the terms of the compromise G had come into existence. It is plain that the plaintiffs are acting under the will, in accordance with the terms of the compromise. They received letters of administration with the will and codicil annexed, part of the compromise being that they would undertake to obtain that grant. It is true that in the compromise various terms were agreed as among the beneficiaries and other parties to the agreement and the result may be that some of the terms of the will have been H modified, but the trust is still the trust under the will and it is unreal to say that at the time this compromise was made the original trust had come to an end and a new trust had come into being. That being so, the defendants are not entitled to demand a release from the plaintiffs as a condition of handing over the documents relating to the estate.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

NAPIER v. NATIONAL BUSINESS AGENCY, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Hodson, L.J.J.), June 7, 1951.]

Contract—Legality—Provision calculated to deceive revenue authorities—Service agreement—Provision for expenses at excessive figure—Enforcement of provision as to salary.

The defendants engaged the plaintiff to act as their secretary and accountant at a salary of £13 a week together with £6 a week for expenses. Both parties were aware that the plaintiff's expenses could never amount to £6 a week, and, in fact, they did not exceed £1 a week. Each week the defendants deducted from the salary of £13 a week the amount of income tax appropriate to that sum, and the payment of £6 a week was represented as a re-imbursement of expenses on the returns made to the Inland Revenue Commissioners. The plaintiff was summarily dismissed, and claimed payment from the defendants, in lieu of notice, of £13 a week for a certain period.

HELD: (i) the provisions of the service agreement relating to expenses were intended to mislead the taxation authorities and evade tax, and, therefore, the agreement was contrary to public policy.

(ii) although the plaintiff sought only to enforce the provisions of the agreement relating to salary, those provisions were not severable from the rest of the agreement and were equally unenforceable.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE A. R. THOMAS, made at the Mayor's and City of London Court and dated Apr. 9, 1951. The plaintiff claimed damages for wrongful dismissal, and the issue between the parties was confined to the length of notice which the plaintiff ought to have received. At the hearing, however, the learned judge formed the view that the agreement for service was contrary to public policy as being intended to evade taxation, and he, therefore, held that the plaintiff was unable to enforce any part of the agreement.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The agreement sued on was one whereby the plaintiff was engaged by the defendants to act as secretary and accountant. The issue which was disclosed by the pleadings concerned the length of notice to which the plaintiff was entitled under that agreement, for, having served some ten months or so, he was summarily dismissed. In fairness to him it should be said that there is no evidence, and, indeed, no plea on the part of the defendants, that he had committed any disgraceful or wrongful act, and the defendants did not attempt to justify his dismissal without notice. After his dismissal they paid him a certain sum, calculated on the basis that he should have had one month's notice. It was the claim of the plaintiff that he was entitled to six months' notice, or, alternatively, to four months' notice.

Witnesses were called for the purpose of dealing with that aspect of the matter, but when the learned judge began his investigation of the case another and very important question began to emerge. It was no part of the defendants' case that the agreement was tainted in the way in which I use that word, and, therefore, the burden fell on the judge to carry out an investigation into the truth of this matter as best he could without the assistance that he would naturally have had from the other party had this matter been an issue in the action. The terms of the bargain, so far as relevant, were that the plaintiff should be paid for his services in the two capacities which I have mentioned, £13 a week for salary and £6 a week for expenses. The learned judge discerned at an early stage, as the matter developed, the possibility that the figure of £6 a week for expenses was not genuine in the sense that it could be taken as a fair representation on the part of either party of the expenses that the plaintiff would in fact incur.

The plaintiff was paid his salary subject to deduction for income tax by means commonly known as "P.A.Y.E." and the defendants made the appropriate deductions in respect of the £13 a week. They disclosed by indorsement on the appropriate forms that the plaintiff also received £6 a week for expenses. It has been urged forcibly by counsel for the plaintiff that the plaintiff has not attempted any concealment from the revenue authorities. He has been to see them about this matter, and has attempted to obtain a solution of the problem between himself and the revenue as to the amount that could fairly be allowed to him for expenses; but he has conceded that, of the £6 a week, not more than £1 a week could have been treated as fairly representing expenses. The result of the plaintiff's candour vis-a-vis the revenue authorities may well be that they will eventually recover from him any tax which ought to have been paid before, but, even assuming that, it is not to be forgotten that in the meantime the defendants will not have accounted, as they ought to have done under the income tax regulations, for the full amount of tax for which they were accountable.

On this aspect of the matter, the learned judge said: "Both parties knew perfectly well that, except on very exceptional occasions, the plaintiff would not incur any expenses," and he then refers to some matters of evidence to support that finding. I venture to make one addition. Before the service began, there was sent in the course of correspondence between the plaintiff and one Hidden, on behalf of the defendant company, a statement of the duties of a secretary plus accountant, and an inspection of that statement discloses that he would not be in the least likely to incur substantial, if, indeed, any, expenses. The case is wholly different from that, say, of a commercial traveller, who has necessarily to be constantly spending money in the way of expenses. The learned judge continued:

"This contract to pay the plaintiff what was undoubtedly, to my mind, part of his salary as expenses I must find was illegal, even if only to the extent that he was receiving money which, or a very large part of which, was liable to tax, and which, or a very large part of which, was not included as salary for the purposes of the returns to the Inland Revenue under the pay-as-you-earn scheme."

Counsel for the plaintiff has observed that the payment by the defendants to the plaintiff of £6 a week expenses was disclosed on the P.A.Y.E. return, but the disclosure, in the form that it took, in itself, as I think, constituted or may be treated fairly as constituting a misrepresentation, for, by stating on the form that £6 a week was paid to the plaintiff for expenses, the defendants were, I should have thought, representing to the revenue that £6 a week or thereabouts was the amount of the expenses which the plaintiff incurred in the course of, and as incidental to, his employment, which was not the fact. The learned judge concludes:

"I cannot help thinking, and I must find as a fact, that when the contract was made the plaintiff intended to allow this to go on, and to avoid paying income tax on it if he possibly could. I think that that was the main attraction of this particular job over the employment he had before he came to the defendant company."

Counsel for the plaintiff has said that the finding is unjust to the plaintiff and is unsupported by evidence, but in all the circumstances I think it impossible for this court to say that the judge was disentitled to find, as he did, that the plaintiff and the defendants together made this bargain knowing well that this was a sham figure which bore no relation to the expenses which, in fact, would be incurred.

If those were the facts, what is the inference? It must surely be that, by making an agreement in that form the parties to it were doing that which they must be taken to know would be liable to defeat the proper claims of the Inland Revenue and to avoid altogether, or at least to postpone, the proper payment of income tax. If that is the right conclusion, it seems to me equally clear (subject to one point which I will mention in a moment) that the agreement must be regarded as contrary to public policy. There is a strong legal obligation placed on all citizens to make true and faithful returns for tax purposes, and, if parties make an agreement which is designed to do the contrary, i.e., to mislead and to delay, it seems to me impossible for this court to enforce that contract at the suit of one party to it.

That being so, the further point arises whether the terms of the agreement relating to the two branches of the plaintiff's reward can be severed, i.e., whether the plaintiff can reject the tainted part of the contract relating to the £6 a week for expenses, and sue only, as he has done, in respect of the £13 a week for remuneration simply so called. I think the answer to that point is in the negative. The contract is, to my mind, not severable. It cannot properly be treated as consisting of two separate and distinct bargains, and, therefore, although it is true that the plaintiff sues only in respect of £13 a week, he is really seeking to enforce a contract which is tainted to the extent I have mentioned. It being so tainted, I think that the court will not enforce it at his suit. I think that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. In these days of high income tax there is a great temptation for employers and servants to describe remuneration as being in part salary and in part expenses. This is done in the hope of evading tax on the part described as expenses, and the temptation must be resisted. In order that an expense allowance should be valid, it must be a genuine estimate of the expenses to be incurred. The insertion of a fictitious figure for expenses in order to defraud the revenue is illegal. It vitiates the whole remuneration and disentitles the servant from recovering any part of it. He cannot recover either the part described as expenses or even the part described as salary. I think that the decision of the judge was quite right. It will have a very salutary effect if it stops people putting in fictitious figures for expenses.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree that the appeal must be dismissed and have nothing to add on the main question. It seems to me impossible to sever the part of this agreement which deals with expenses from the part which deals with salary. The plaintiff entered into this agreement in consideration of receiving both sums, viz., the £13 a week and the £6 a week for expenses, and, on the basis that those two cannot be split, the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

BERNARD & SHAW, LTD. v. SHAW (RUBIN THIRD PARTY).

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lynskey, J.), June 7, 1951.]

Income Tax—P.A.Y.E. ("Pay-as-you-earn") system—Employers' failure to deduct tax from gross salary—Tax claimed from, but not paid by, employers—Tax not recoverable by employers from employee as money paid to the use of employer or from employee as trustee for employers—Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943 (c. 45), s. 1 (1), (2) (as extended by Income Tax (Offices and Employments) Act, 1944 (c. 12), s. 1 (1)), s. 2—Income Tax (Employments) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 453), reg. 52 (2).

A company paid to one of its directors certain sums as remuneration for his services without deducting income tax as required by the Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943, s. 1 (1) and (2) (as substituted by s. 1 (1) of the Income Tax (Offices and Employments) Act, 1944), and the Income Tax (Employments) Regulations, 1950. On receipt of a claim by the revenue authorities against the company for the payment of income tax on the sums so paid, the company sought to recover from the director the amount of tax which should have been deducted.

HELD: (i) plaintiffs could not recover the amount in question as money had and received by the defendant to their use since the tax had not, in fact, been paid by the company, nor as money paid under a mistake of fact since the failure to deduct tax was not due to any mistake of fact in paying the remuneration to the director, but to a breach, by the company, of their statutory obligations as employers to make deductions.

(ii) the director was not a trustee of the money so as to enable the company to recover it from him as money to which they were legally entitled.

Denby v. Moore (1817) 1 B. & Ald. 123, applied.

Semble: The sole remedy given the company by the Act of 1943 and the regulations of 1950 was to deduct the amount from subsequent payments of remuneration to the director.

ACTION for money alleged to have been lent to, or paid to the use of, the defendant.

From 1946 to Apr. 14, 1947, the defendant was a director of the plaintiff company. On Apr. 14, 1947, the defendant entered into an agreement with his co-director, Mr. Rubin, to sell his interest in the company to Mr. Rubin on the terms that Mr. Rubin would procure the company to discharge any income tax for which the defendant might be liable in respect of the remuneration he received from the company and of dividends paid to the defendant by the company up to Apr. 21, 1947, the defendant, in turn, releasing any claim he might have against the company. The company claimed that sums totalling £1,682 0s. 3d., which had been paid to the defendant in respect of the period during which he had been a director of the company, were made by way of loan, or, alternatively, that, if they represented remuneration for his services, they included the sum of £709 10s., being income tax which should have been deducted from that remuneration by the company under the "pay-as-you-earn" system, which sum the Inland Revenue had subsequently claimed from the company. The company claimed to be entitled to recover the amount of the tax from the defendant on the ground that this sum was due to them as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the company; that, there being a legal liability on the company to pay the tax to the Inland Revenue, the company were entitled to recover it from the defendant; and that, as the defendant was a director of the company, he must have been a party to the payment of the money to himself, and, therefore, held the sum as trustee for the company.

Lester for the plaintiffs.

Caplan for the defendant.

LYNSKEY, J., stated the facts, found that the plaintiff company had paid to the defendant the sum claimed, and that the payment had been, not by way of loan, but in respect of his salary, and continued: I now come to the alternative claim, which is framed in the statement of claim as follows:

“Alternatively, if the said sum represented salary, it includes the sum of £709 10s. being income tax (P.A.Y.E.) for which tax the Inland Revenue now makes claim against the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover such tax against the defendant, but the defendant has failed, neglected and refused to pay the same.”

There is an alternative claim for that sum of £709 10s. as tax due on the salary paid to the defendant.

I have first to find whether the facts alleged give any cause of action to the plaintiffs at the present time or whether the plaintiffs had any cause of action in respect of that sum at the date of the issue of the writ. In the present case it does not matter, however, which date I take. The plaintiffs say that this sum was due to them as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs. They say that the defendant was under liability to pay tax to the Inland Revenue in respect of the remuneration which he received, that they (the plaintiffs) did not deduct the tax from his remuneration as they were entitled to do and ought to have done, and, therefore, that the defendant has been overpaid his remuneration by the amount which represents the tax which was not deducted. It is said that in those circumstances the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendant that sum as money had and received at the time of receipt to the use of the plaintiffs.

I have been referred to the Income Tax (Employments) Regulations, 1950, made on Mar. 25, 1950, by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943, s. 2, and the Finance Act, 1946, s. 30. Under s. 1 (1) and (2) of the Act of 1943, as extended by the Income Tax (Offices and Employments) Act, 1944, s. 1 (1) and s. 2, and under reg. 13 of the regulations of 1950 an obligation is imposed on employers to ascertain the total emoluments which each of their employees is earning or is likely to earn or has earned in any particular year and then to deduct from the remuneration or emolument payable to the employee the appropriate tax, notwithstanding that when the payment is made no assessment has been made in respect of the emoluments. Where there has been an assessment, then a certificate or card is issued which bears on it a code number which directs the employer as to the proper amount to be deducted weekly, monthly or quarterly, as the case may be, from the employee's remuneration. In respect of the collection of tax a statutory duty is, therefore, imposed on the employer, and, if he fails to deduct tax, he is in breach of that duty and is liable to pay the tax to the revenue authorities whether he has deducted it or not.

In the present case the plaintiffs did not carry out their statutory obligations by deducting tax. They paid all the remuneration without any deduction. It is said on their behalf that in any event the effect is that the defendant would escape liability for that tax as they have not deducted it, and, therefore, he has received money to their use. I am not satisfied that the defendant would escape liability for the tax due from him in respect of his remuneration. The contrary view is, apparently, held by Mr. Passer, a chartered accountant, who gave evidence before me. In a letter written on Mar. 24, 1950, to the solicitors for the defendant he says:

A "With reference to your letter of Feb. 1, and the previous correspondence, would you please note that I have been authorised by the Inland Revenue authorities to amend the liability of your client for P.A.Y.E. by reference to the actual dates on which Mr. Shaw [the defendant] drew sums from the company. The amended liability is as follows: 1946-47 £480 13s., 1947-48 £228 17s. Total £709 10s. I will be calling a meeting of my committee of inspection in about two weeks' time to obtain the necessary authority to take proceedings against your client. I understand that the inspector of taxes, in protection of the interests of the Inland Revenue, has raised an assessment direct on your client. In the event—which I consider to be unlikely—of my failing to obtain judgment against your client, they would proceed themselves against your client and I cannot, therefore, see the point of your client contesting my claim."

C Whether that is a correct statement of the law or not, I do not think it necessary to decide, although, in my view, the provisions of reg. 52 (2) of the regulations of 1950 would appear, on the face of them, to authorise the inspector to raise an assessment and to recover the tax where the tax has not been deducted. Regulation 52 (2) provides:

D "If the tax payable under the assessment exceeds the total net tax deducted from the employee's emoluments during the year, the inspector may require the employee to pay the excess to the collector instead of taking it into account in determining the appropriate code for a subsequent year, and where the inspector so requires the employee shall pay the excess accordingly."

E I do not, however, think it necessary that I should decide this point in the present case, because it seems to me that this money was paid to and received by the defendant as remuneration. It was remuneration to which he was entitled, and the plaintiffs knew that they were paying it in full. In no circumstances could it be said that in the making of that payment there was any mistake of fact. What happened was that, instead of exercising their right, and, indeed, carrying out their statutory obligation, to make deductions, the plaintiffs failed to do so.

F That being so, I should have thought without any authority that it could not be said that the defendant received this money to the use of the plaintiffs. Any doubt that I might have is resolved by the decision as long ago as 1817 in Denby v. Moore (1). The headnote reads:

G "An occupier of lands having, during a course of twelve years, paid to the collector of taxes the landlord's property tax, and the full rent as it became due to the landlord, without claiming any deduction on account of the tax so paid: Held that the occupier could not recover back from the landlord any part of the property tax so paid."

H From the point of view of principle, the facts are extremely similar, and the judgments proceed on the assumption that, the payment not having been deducted at the proper time, it could not afterwards be claimed in an action of assumpsit for money had and received. BAYLEY, J., put it in this way (1 B. & Ald. 128):

"On the discussion I am satisfied that this action cannot be maintained. The payment was made at a time when it was in the tenant's power to have deducted the sum in question. He must have known that he had a right so to deduct it. Knowing this, he chooses nevertheless to make this payment. Then that is a voluntary payment which he cannot recover back by this action."

There is no suggestion of any mistake there. HOLROYD, J., said (ibid., 130):

"The statute directs that the tenant shall deduct the money from his next rent. Then that money is as so much rent already paid to the landlord. If the tenant afterwards chooses to pay the whole rent, it must be a voluntary payment on his part as to the portion paid by him before. I therefore think that being a voluntary payment he cannot recover it back by this form of action."

I am satisfied that the basis on which the present case was put forward primarily was as for money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs, and that is a form of action which must fail. It is next suggested that, because there is a legal liability to pay the tax to the Inland Revenue authorities, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover it from the defendant. I know of no such form of action. If the money had in fact been paid by the plaintiffs in discharge of the tax liability, it might well be that there would be a cause of action for money paid by the plaintiffs to the use of the defendant, on the basis that they were compelled by process of law to pay money which was due in respect of his remuneration as to which he would ultimately be responsible for taxation. In those circumstances, the money might be recovered, but in the present case the money has not been paid, and, until the money is paid, it seems to me that there can be no action for money paid to the use of the defendant.

Finally, it is suggested that the money can be recovered on the basis of some form of trusteeship—that, as the defendant was a director of the plaintiff company and must have been a party to the payment of these sums to himself, therefore, some equity arises on his having received the money and he must hold it as trustee for the plaintiffs. I have asked for authority to enable me to say that such a cause of action would lie. These are matters of taxation; they are not misfeasance proceedings. This is a common law action, and I know of no principle either at common law or equity which would enable me to say that when a company (although it be a legal entity and not an individual) voluntarily pays money to a person without deduction when there should have been deduction that makes the recipient of the voluntary payment a trustee for the company in the absence of some other equity arising, and I see no other equity arising. In my view, unless the plaintiffs can point to some provision in the Finance Act, 1943, or the regulations made thereunder which entitles them to claim from an employee money which they have failed to deduct at the time of prior payment, their action must fail. So far as I can see from the regulations of 1950, an employer who fails to deduct tax from remuneration in respect of one period can deduct it at a later period from remuneration to the employee, but the sole remedy given to the employer by the Acts and regulations is a method by deduction. No power is given to the employer to recover from his employee sums which he ought to have deducted and did not. In the present case a right is given to the plaintiffs to deduct, but no right is given to them to claim back, and, unless such a right is given, then the plaintiffs are left without remedy against the defendant except by way of deduction from his remuneration, either present or future. The result, in my judgment, is that the claim fails.

MARCROFT WAGONS, LTD. v. SMITH.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning, L.J., and Roxburgh, J.), May 22, 23, 1951.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Implied grant—Death of second statutory tenant—Permission to member of family to remain in occupation—Payment of rent—Occupation continuing for six months.

A From 1901 until his death in 1938 A. occupied a dwelling-house within the Rent Acts which belonged to the plaintiffs, and (as the court found) at his death was a statutory tenant thereof. His widow and daughter continued to occupy the house until the widow's death on Mar. 16, 1950. On Mar. 27, 1950, the daughter called on the plaintiffs' representative, B., and asked that her name should be put in the rent book, and that the tenancy should be transferred to her. B. refused, and said that the house was required for an employee of the plaintiffs. He said, however, that he did not wish to disturb her, and he accepted two weeks' rent. The daughter remained in possession, paying rent, for about six months.

HELD: no tenancy had been created between the plaintiffs and the daughter.

C Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: Until the Rent Restrictions Acts came into force in the present century the law inferred, when exclusive possession was granted to one of the property of another at a rent payable to that other, that a tenancy had been created. The law did not recognise that those conditions were compatible with any other kind of relationship. But consideration of similar facts today must be against the background of the conception of the statutory tenancy, the conception that a person may have such a right to exclusive possession of property as to enable him to bring an action of trespass against the owner of that property, but yet that such right would not confer any interest whatever on the occupier.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE WRANGHAM, made at Ashby-de-la-Zouch County Court on Mar. 15, 1951.

The learned judge held that the defendant was not entitled to occupy a dwelling-house as statutory tenant thereof by virtue of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), nor had she been granted a new tenancy, although she had been in exclusive possession and had paid rent for six months.

Mrs. Y. Frazer for the defendant.

Grieves for the plaintiffs.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: Marcroft Wagons, Ltd., the plaintiffs, sought possession from the defendant, Mrs. Dorothy May Smith, of a dwelling-house known as 6, Mantle Lane, Coalville, in the county of Leicester. From a date early in the century, Mr. Sidney Aris, who was the defendant's father, was occupying the premises as the tenant of the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title. I use the word "tenant" advisedly, meaning thereby a person having an estate in the property, i.e., being a lessee or having such estate as is conferred by a contractual tenancy. Whether he remained in that capacity until his death is a point to which I will presently return. He died on Mar. 8, 1938, leaving his widow, Mrs. Aris, him surviving. She remained in the same house, living there until her own death twelve years later on Mar. 16, 1950. When she died, the defendant, now Mrs. Smith but then Miss Aris, was living in the house, and it is in evidence that she had in fact lived there ever since her birth in 1901. Shortly after her mother's death, the defendant met and had a conversation with a representative of the plaintiffs, and much will be seen to turn on what occurred during that conversation. But no move was made by the plaintiffs to recover possession of the house until September, 1950, when, following certain letters between the solicitors to the two parties, the present proceedings were begun.

I have in my brief narrative tried to avoid any points which are in controversy and tried to use language which shall in no way prejudice them. It is plain that the position of the defendant may vary according to whether her father, Mr. Aris, at his death in 1938 was or was not a contractual tenant. If he was a contractual tenant, then his wife (who, as I have said, remained on after her husband's death) was at first also a contractual tenant, but it is conceded that, if she was a contractual tenant at the beginning of her widowhood, she undoubtedly became later during her life a statutory tenant, and, if on her death in March, 1950, she was a statutory tenant and was the first of this family to qualify as a statutory tenant, then it would follow (and this much is conceded by the plaintiffs) by virtue of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), that the defendant has qualified as a person entitled to remain in occupation, for she was a member of the statutory tenant's family who had resided with the statutory tenant for the requisite length of time before the latter's death. If, on the other hand, Mr. Aris before his death had ceased to be a contractual tenant and had become a statutory tenant, then (and again this is conceded) Mrs. Aris would acquire the benefits conferred on members of the tenant's family by s. 12 (1) (g) above-mentioned, but with her own death the scope of that sub-section would be exhausted so that the defendant would not be able to pray it in aid to protect her continued occupation. Although the points have been argued in the converse order in this court, it will, I think, be convenient to deal immediately with the question I have already adumbrated, viz., whether Mr. Sidney Aris ceased to be a contractual tenant during his life. [His LORDSHIP considered the evidence, held that it could not be said that there was no evidence on which the learned judge could have held that Mr. Aris was a statutory tenant, and continued:] If that conclusion, then, be right, it follows that the defendant cannot rely on s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. Her case must depend (and this has been the main point put forward to this court) on the submission that at this meeting on Mar. 27, 1950, and as a result of what took place then and thereafter, the court should infer that there came into existence a new contractual tenancy between the plaintiffs and the defendant. I confess I find that this is a difficult matter. The court is in a sense hedged around with difficulties of this kind, because, it is suggested, whichever way the court decides this matter, our decision may lead in other cases to results not entirely satisfactory. I am, however, undeterred by those matters.

A It is a trite saying that each case in our courts depends on its own particular facts, and what we decide in this case should, therefore, by no means form any guide to what proper inference should be drawn from different facts in different cases. Having referred to the evidence given as to what transpired on Mar. 27, 1950, and having referred to the arguments put forward by counsel for both parties, the learned judge said:

B "I think both of the arguments are extremely attractive and at first I was convinced provisionally that anyone who was allowed to live in a house and deemed to have exclusive occupation of it must be a tenant, but I have come to the conclusion that on this branch of the case I ought to hold that the true interpretation of what took place on Mar. 27, 1950, is that the plaintiffs did not agree to grant an estate in land, i.e., that the plaintiffs did not create a tenancy, that what was done was solely to grant a licence for C an undefined time in consideration of her paying a sum equal to that paid by her mother by way of rent. I think it really follows from the decision of CASSELS, J., in Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries v. Matthews (1), in which he held that occupants of requisitioned premises were licensees, that persons who inhabit premises with exclusive possession can be mere licensees, and that the proper interpretation is that the defendant was offered and accepted D that kind of licence."

Counsel for the defendant says, first, that that contains, on the face of it, a misstatement of the law, for she says that if in point of fact two parties agree that one of them is to have the exclusive possession of premises belonging to the other, paying a rent for it, the result must be to bring into existence a tenancy of some kind—either a tenancy from week to week or a tenancy at will, but a tenancy—E and so far as this case is concerned it does not matter what the terms of the tenancy were if a tenancy was created. Secondly, she says that the learned judge misled himself by his citation of Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries v. Matthews (1). That was a case which related to premises which had been requisitioned by a Minister of State, and the Minister, having requisitioned the property, let persons into occupation of the premises on terms which on the face of them bore F all the marks of tenancy, but, as a Minister requisitioning property has no estate whatever, it followed that he could not grant to others an estate which he himself had not got. That case illustrates one of the features of modern times, viz., the creation of rights of occupation having in most respects the attributes of a tenancy but lacking the estate in land which is a necessary incident of a tenancy. But illustrating, as it does, that modern conception, it is, as counsel G points out, not quite an analogy to the present case, for the case really turned on the circumstance that the Minister could not grant something which he himself had not.

It is clear that there is much force in the argument of the defendant, and, having regard to the facts as I shall presently more fully refer to them, I could well understand that a judge trying this case might have come to the conclusion H that there was a tenancy and that that was the right inference as to the intention of the parties. I might have so decided it myself. But, whatever be the significance attached to the reference to the decision of CASSELS, J., and however open, as I think, with all deference, the words of the learned judge's judgment are to criticism in some respects, it is plain that the learned judge, having seen the witnesses and heard their evidence and having also referred to the correspondence in September, 1950, came to a conclusion of fact that there was here no intention on the part of either the plaintiffs' representative, on the one hand, or of the defendant, on the other, to create a tenancy—no intention, indeed, to do other than allow the existing state of affairs (whatever in law it was) to continue for some limited time.

[HIS LORDSHIP said that the evidence showed that on Mar. 27, 1950, the defendant called on the plaintiffs' representative, B., and asked that her name should be put in the rent book, and that the tenancy should be transferred to her. B. said that he was not prepared to put the defendant in that position and that the property was required for an employee of the plaintiffs. B. said, however, that he did not wish to disturb her and accepted two weeks' rent. The defendant continued to live in the house with the consent of the plaintiffs and to pay rent for about six months. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] The most troublesome matter, speaking for myself, has been the length of time that elapsed between March and September, 1950, before the plaintiffs took any further step. There is no doubt that the intricacies of modern life, as reflected in the rent restrictions legislation, have made, in many respects, the relationship between landlords and tenants assume an artificial, and, indeed, unfriendly, character which is somewhat to be deplored. In particular, landlords, who may have ordinary human instincts of kindness and courtesy, may often be afraid to allow to a tenant the benefit of those natural instincts in case it may afterwards turn out that a tenant has thereby acquired a position from which he cannot subsequently be dislodged. In the general interest it may be necessary that the relationship should have to assume a much more formal character than would otherwise be necessary. Nevertheless, I should be extremely sorry if anything which fell from this court were to have the result that a landlord could never grant to a person in the position of the defendant any kind of indulgence, particularly in circumstances such as existed in March, 1950, when the defendant lost her mother. It seems to me that it would be quite shocking if, because a landlord allowed a condition of affairs to remain undisturbed for some short period of time, the law would have to infer therefrom that a relationship had arisen which made it impossible thereafter for the landlord to recover possession of the property when, admittedly, by taking proper measures from the start he could have got possession.

There is another very important matter to be borne in mind in considering what inference should be drawn in cases of this kind. Until, in the present century, the Rent Restrictions Acts came into force, the law, broadly speaking, necessarily inferred, when exclusive possession was granted to one of the property of another at a rent payable to that other, that a tenancy had been created. The law did not recognise that those conditions were compatible with any other kind of relationship. That, I think, sufficiently appears from the passage in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 20, p. 8, to which counsel for the defendant referred. But it is now quite clear that, to use the formula which before has been applied, a new monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens has come into our ken—the conception of a statutory tenancy, the conception that a person may have such a right of exclusive possession of property as to entitle him to bring an action for trespass against the owner of that property, but yet that such right would not confer any interest whatever in the land on the occupier who would not be able to dispose of it by grant or by testamentary disposition. It is, as has been said, a statutory right of irremovability. Many illustrations have been before the court, and if I read a few sentences from the judgment of BANKES, L.J., in Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (2) I shall, I think, as well as possible illustrate the strangeness, at any rate as it would have appeared to a pedantic lawyer of the nineteenth century, of this conception that I have mentioned. Referring in that case to the person claiming to retain possession of the premises, BANKES, L.J., said ([1921] 1 K.B. 54):

“In no ordinary sense of the word was the respondent a tenant of the premises on July 2. His term had expired. His landlords had endeavoured to get him to go out. He was not even a tenant at sufferance. It is however clear that in all the Rent Restrictions Acts the expression 'tenant' has been used in a special, a peculiar sense, and as including a person who might be described as an ex-tenant, some one whose occupation had commenced as tenant and who had continued in occupation without any legal right to do so except possibly such as the Acts themselves conferred upon him."

- A Every owner of property today appreciates that the effect of the Rent Restrictions Acts is such that in all human probability if the owner claims to get or desires to get possession of the property he will have to go to the county court and get an order for possession. In other words, the landlord's right to recover possession is now a right to go to the county court and get an order for possession; and, in judging the inference to be drawn from such events as took place here, it
- B seems to me vital to bear in mind that that is the background against which people must now discuss and regulate their affairs. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the circumstances in which the defendant was permitted to remain in the house and continued:] If three, four, five or six weeks had elapsed, and then the plaintiffs had said "Well, now, we have given you a reasonable time: we are afraid we must ask you to go," it seems to me that the defendant's case would
- C have been almost unarguable. But, as I have already said, the plaintiffs allowed the occupation to continue for six months, and that length of time, in view of the evidence given, would, I think, have been an important matter to any judge considering what, at the end of that period, was the proper inference to be drawn. In all the circumstances, however, I cannot think that six months is necessarily so long a period that we must treat as untenable the judge's conclusion
- D that there was no change of intention on the part of either party between March and September, 1950—in other words, that at the end of that six months' period, as at the beginning, the real inference was that, the plaintiffs' representative and the defendant having met, it was agreed between them that the status quo should be allowed for the present to continue. Although I agree with counsel for the defendant that Ministry of Agriculture v. Matthews (1) is of a different
- E character, nevertheless, for the reasons that I have tried to state, I think that in existing circumstances such a permission given to the defendant does not in the eyes of the law necessarily involve the inference of a tenancy. It is compatible with the conception which is to be found in the statutory tenant under the Rent Acts, and that to be found in other examples of a right to occupy premises with many of the attributes of a tenancy but without the essential qualification of
- F having any interest in land. I think that the learned judge had evidence here which entitled him so to find, and I, on the whole, have come to the conclusion that we ought not to disturb that finding of fact.

Counsel for the defendant suggested that by such a decision we should be inviting all landlords to evade the Act by never granting a tenancy but merely permitting occupants to become such as licensees. I have already said that I

G am not sufficiently frightened by that argument. I think that where the question arises out of a new relationship between an owner of property and an occupant, the inference to be drawn when the occupant is first allowed to go into exclusive possession is prima facie very different from the inference proper to be drawn, though not necessarily to be drawn, in a case such as this, where the person in occupation has lived on the premises, as this defendant has, for a long period of

H time and has in effect succeeded to the occupational privileges (to use a somewhat colourless phrase) possessed by her parent on that parent's death.

Our attention was drawn to Steel (M. & H.) v. Cockcroft (3). That case has on the face of it some little similarity to the present, for the person against whom possession was sought was a child of parents both of whom had successively lived in the house, as had the parents of the present defendant. The other facts were not by any means identical. I mention the case because at least it does seem to show that the circumstances which I think so important, viz., the existence of this conception of an occupational right without an estate in the land, may alter or affect the inference to be drawn from facts which, in other days, would have been held to amount to a tenancy. That circumstance was considered in Steel (M. & H.) v. Cockcroft (3) and was relevant to the conclusion in that case, which is at least not inconsistent with the conclusion at which I arrive in the present case.

For the reasons I have stated, I have on the whole, therefore, come to the conclusion that this appeal fails and ought to be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. The original tenant, Mr. Aris, had been in the house ever since 1901 and he had died in 1938. The first question is whether he became a statutory tenant. The only evidence on that point was that his daughter said:

"I think the rent had been increased. I can remember it being put up a time or two. I think we had to pay when the rates went up."

I think that was sufficient evidence on which the judge could infer that valid notices of increase had been given and that Mr. Aris had become a statutory tenant. As I pointed out in Brock v. Wollams (4), when a tenant has been in occupation for many years, the court may have to act on very slight indications in determining whether or not a statutory tenancy has arisen. I think this evidence was sufficient. After Mr. Aris died in 1938, his widow became entitled to remain on under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 as what is called the "shadow" of a statutory tenant, and she remained there by virtue of the statute until her death in 1950. But when the widow died, all statutory rights came to an end. The daughter, although she had been living there for fifty years, had no statutory right. It so happened, however, that after the mother died in 1950, the landlords let the daughter stay on for six months. She paid rent and the landlords accepted it; but they refused to change the rent book into her name. They refused to let her have the tenancy. What is the result of that?

According to the common law as it stood before the Rent Acts, when the daughter stayed on with the consent of the landlords, she would have become a tenant at will, and when she afterwards paid a weekly rent which was accepted by them, she would become a weekly tenant. That would be the result at common law, notwithstanding the refusal of the landlords to change the rent book into her name. Starting from that position, counsel for the defendant contended that, inasmuch as the daughter would at common law be a tenant at a rackrent, she is entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts; and she cited Buck v. Howarth (5) and Chamberlain v. Farr (6) in support of her contentions. In my opinion, however, it is not correct to consider the common law position separately from the new position created by the Rent Acts. It must be remembered that when the mother died, the daughter might well be thought to have a statutory right to remain. Suppose that the father at his death in 1938 had been a contractual tenant, and the mother at her death in 1950 had been a statutory tenant, the daughter would have been entitled to remain in occupation under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. That, indeed, was the contention put forward by her solicitors as soon as they were instructed on her behalf, and they have sought to maintain it in the courts. It is true they have not succeeded, but it was an arguable point. This removes the case from the common law altogether.

It must be remembered that at common law the landlords would have had a clear, indisputable right to turn the daughter out, and, even if they did allow her to stay on and accepted rent from her, the consequences would not be serious because the landlords could always get rid of her by giving her a week's notice to quit. In that state of affairs, it was very proper to infer a tenancy at will, or a weekly tenancy, as the case may be, from the acceptance of rent, but it is very different when the rights of the landlords are obscured by the Rent Restrictions Acts. Seeing that the house was within the Acts, the landlords had no clear right to turn the daughter out. They could not have done so except by proving to the county court that she was not protected by the Acts. The consequences of granting her a contractual tenancy would be very far-reaching, because she would then be clothed with the valuable status of irremovability conferred by the Rent Acts. In these circumstances it is no longer proper for the courts to infer a tenancy at will, or a weekly tenancy, as they would previously have done from the mere acceptance of rent. They should only infer a new tenancy when the facts truly warrant it. The test to be applied in Rent Act cases is the same test as that laid down in Doe d. Cheney v. Batten (7) by LORD MANSFIELD in cases of holding over (1 Cowp. 245):

“ The question therefore is, quo animo the rent was received, and what the real intention of both parties was? ”

Doe d. Cheney v. Batten (7) was followed by this court very recently in Clarke v. Grant (8). If the acceptance of rent can be explained on some other footing than a contractual tenancy, as, for instance, by reason of an existing or possible statutory right to remain, then a new tenancy should not be inferred.

It may well be asked: If the daughter was not a tenant, what was she? She was, I think, a licensee in this sense, that she did not acquire any interest in the land. That is the sense in which the word “ licensee ” has often been used of late.

It is used to denote a permissive occupation falling short of a tenancy. For instance, when a requisitioning authority allows a person to occupy a house at a rent, the occupant is said to be a licensee because he has no interest in the land: see Minister of Health v. Bellotti (9); Southgate Borough Council v. Watson (10). Where a tenant was allowed to occupy a house rent free for the rest of his days, he was held to be a licensee: see Foster v. Robinson (11). So also, in cases like the present, I think it may be quite proper to call the occupant a licensee, even though a sum is paid for use and occupation and even though the sum is called rent. The real reason for using the word “ licensee ” is to denote the fact that the occupant has no legal interest in the land, but only a permissive occupation short of a tenancy.

Nothing that I have said must be taken to apply to new occupants let in by a landlord. I confine myself to a person who is in the house and who has some colourable ground for saying that he or she is protected by the Rent Acts. In such cases I think that the landlord can give such a person permission to occupy and can receive a weekly payment from him without necessarily creating a tenancy; but the longer that goes on, the more likely it is that the court will infer that a new tenancy in fact has been created. In this case there was ample evidence to justify the court in refusing to infer a tenancy in the daughter. The landlords expressly refused to put her name on the rent book, and she knew it. That is shown by the letter which her solicitors wrote six months later in which they said:

“ Our client quite understands that the landlords are unwilling to transfer the tenancy to her as they require it for their own workmen.”

I think the judge was right in saying that she had merely a permissive occupation to which did not attach any statutory rights under the Rent Acts. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree. Generally speaking, when a person, having a sufficient estate in land, lets another into exclusive possession, a tenancy results, and there is no question of a licence. But the inference of a tenancy is not necessarily to be drawn where a person succeeds on a death to occupation of rent-controlled premises and a landlord accepts some rent while he or the occupant, or both of them, is or are considering his or their position. If this is all that happened in this case, then no tenancy would result. How the interest of the occupant ought, in those circumstances, to be described I do not know. It would, I think, be a pity to call it a licence, because that word has, in connection with landlord and tenant, already been appropriated to quite different situations.

It must, I think, be left to jurists to invent a new name for what the Master of the Rolls has so aptly called "monstrum informe." But if, on the other hand, the plaintiffs intended to let the defendant remain in occupation until they actually required the premises for their own employee, then I should have thought that a tenancy would result. However, it must always be a question of fact and degree.

The county court judge has found quite plainly as a fact that no new tenancy was created. I am not satisfied that he has misdirected himself in law by reason of his reference to the decision of CASSELS, J., in Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries v. Matthews (1). That was quite a different case. Presumably the grantor in that case had himself no estate or interest in the land, and, if that be so, he could not have created a tenancy. Here the landlord could quite easily have created a tenancy and the question is, as I think, whether he was merely leaving the defendant in occupation while he and she considered their respective positions or whether he agreed to leave her in occupation until he should actually require the premises for use for an employee. I think, on the whole, that that is the question to which the county court judge directed his mind and that what he has really found is that the plaintiffs intended the defendant to remain for the time being in occupation of the premises for a consideration, but without becoming a tenant. Such a conclusion, which is one of fact, was, in my view, permissible in law in a Rent Acts case, and it is one at which, I think, he could properly arrive; but the case was very near the line and it would have been easy to reach a different conclusion.

Appeal dismissed.

HOWELL v. FALMOUTH BOAT CONSTRUCTION, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Tucker), April 3, 4, June 20, 1951.]

Ship—Repairs—Licence—Need to be in writing—Retrospective effect—Oral permission given by Admiralty licensing officer—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927), reg. 55 (1)—Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 142), art. 1.

By the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940, art. 1, the Admiralty, in pursuance of powers conferred on them by reg. 55 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, ordered that no ship repairer was to carry out any repairs or alterations to ships "except under the authority of a licence granted by the Admiralty." On June 22, 1942, the Director of Merchant Shipbuilding and Repairs at the Admiralty sent a circular letter to all licensing officers as follows: "I understand that it has been made clear to you that where you are dealing with reliable ship repairers and owners with a good record you ought not to delay the putting in hand of obvious repairs, merely pending the actual issue of a licence."

In December, 1946, the appellant entered into a contract with a firm of ship repairers, for the conversion of a naval vessel into a passenger carrying vessel. The firm applied to the licensing officer of the Admiralty for a licence to carry out the work. This was refused on the ground of shortage of timber, but oral permission was given by the licensing officer to the firm to proceed with the work using their own materials. On Mar. 15, 1947, before any work had begun, the respondents were incorporated and, with the appellant's consent, took over the contract. Work began in May, 1947, with the licensing officer's knowledge and permission, and he thereafter regularly inspected its progress and gave directions how it should be carried out. In October, 1947, the respondents, requiring more timber, applied to the licensing officer for a licence and on Oct. 11, 1947, a written licence was granted. On being presented with an account for work done, the appellant refused to pay on the ground that the work was illegal, it being alleged that the order of 1940 required a written licence to be given and that this had not been obtained until Oct. 11, 1947.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of reg. 55 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, and of the order of 1940, "licence" meant a licence in writing, but it was capable of having a retrospective effect so as to cover work carried out before Oct. 11, under the oral permission of the licensing officer;

(ii) even if the licence was not retrospective, the order of 1940 was ambiguous, and, being of a penal nature, it must be construed in favour of the respondents, who were, therefore, entitled to payment for the work carried out.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL ([1950] 1 All E.R. 538), affirmed on different grounds.

APPEAL by the defendant from a decision of the Court of Appeal, dated Feb. 10, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 538, allowing an appeal of the respondents (the plaintiffs in the action) from an order of His Honour SIR TOM EASTHAM, K.C., official referee, made on July 18, 1949, on a preliminary point.

The official referee found that certain work in connection with a ship, the property of the appellant, had been carried out by the respondents without the written licence of the Admiralty and so was illegal, and, therefore, that the respondents could recover nothing from the appellant in respect of the work. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision, holding that an oral licence was sufficient.

The House took time for consideration.

June 20. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, which is about to be read, and I propose only to make some observations on the law applicable to the facts as stated by him.

The substantial question is whether the plea raised by the appellant—that the work in respect of which the respondents' claim was made was illegal in that they had no licence from the Admiralty to carry it out—is a valid plea. The plea is founded on the general proposition that

“... what is done in contravention of the provisions of an Act of Parliament, cannot be made the subject-matter of an action.”

These are the words used by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (1 M. & S. 596) in Langton v. Hughes (1) and they have been cited with approval by the highest authority. I have no doubt that they are equally applicable to what is done in contravention of a regulation lawfully made under the authority of an Act of Parliament and of an order lawfully made under the authority of such a regulation. That which is prohibited cannot lawfully be done whether the prohibition is contained in Act or regulation or order, and if it cannot lawfully be done it cannot be the subject of a claim enforceable at law.

How, then, is this plea met by the respondents? They say, in the first place, that the assumption of illegality is not well founded and that the appellant is wrong in his contention that on the true construction of the relevant Act, regulation and order it was necessary that a licence in writing should be granted by the competent authority before they began or completed the work. This question I will examine later, for I would first deal with the reasons why, in the opinion of DENNING, L.J., the plea fails. The learned lord justice gave two reasons. He was prepared to assume that the original order of 1940 postulated a licence in writing, but, nevertheless, thought that in the circumstances the court should presume (applying the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta), that it had been varied so as to enable oral permission to be given. Your Lordships were told that this contention had not been debated at the Bar and that the appellant's counsel had no opportunity of dealing with it. He was able, given the opportunity, to satisfy the House that no such varying order had in fact been made, citing in particular the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Revocation Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 1766) which would in its terms be inconsistent with such an order. In the circumstances the respondents' counsel did not rely on this reason. The second reason given by the learned lord justice was based on the same assumption as the first and on the further assumption that a varying order ought not to be presumed. He described the principle that he invoked as of particular importance in these days when the officers of government departments are given much authority by orders and circulars which are not available to the public. I will state this principle in his own words ([1950] 1 All E.R. 542):

“Whenever government officers, in their dealings with a subject, take on themselves to assume authority in a matter with which the subject is concerned, he is entitled to rely on their having the authority which they assume. He does not know, and cannot be expected to know, the limits of their authority and he ought not to suffer if they exceed it. That was the principle which I applied in Robertson v. Minister of Pensions (2) and it is applicable in the present case also.”

My Lords, I know of no such principle in our law nor was any authority for it cited. The illegality of an act is the same whether or not the actor has been misled by an assumption of authority on the part of a government officer however high or low in the hierarchy. I do not doubt that in criminal proceedings it would be a material factor that the actor had been thus misled if knowledge was a necessary element of the offence, and in any case it would have a bearing on the sentence to be imposed, but that is not the question. The question is whether the character of an act done in face of a statutory prohibition is affected by the fact that it has been induced by a misleading assumption of authority. In my opinion, the answer is clearly: No. Such an answer may make more difficult the task of the citizen who is anxious to walk in the narrow way, but that does not justify a different answer being given. I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal cannot be sustained for the reasons given by DENNING, L.J., but

I am, nevertheless, of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons to be given by the noble and learned Lord who follows me, with which I am in full agreement, and I will add only a few words.

A I have come to the conclusion that on the true construction of the relevant order the word "licence" means "licence in writing." If, having given the matter the best consideration I could, I remained in doubt, I should think it proper to apply to this case also the principle applied in London & North Eastern Ry. Co. v. Berriman (3). In that case LORD PORTER ([1946] 1 All E.R. 268) re-asserted the rule (I use his own words) that

B "... where a statute imposes a penalty ... and the obligation in respect of which the penalty is imposed is expressed in ambiguous terms, the more lenient construction of the section should be adopted so that the penalty may not be incurred in a doubtful case."

LORD MACMILLAN said (ibid., 260) that:

"Where penalties for infringement are imposed it is not legitimate to stretch the language of a rule, however beneficent its intention, beyond the fair and ordinary meaning of its language."

C I ventured to sum up the rule in the phrase that a man should not be put in peril on an ambiguity. I regard it as of particular importance that this rule should be observed, whether the statutory prescription refers to the invasion of copyright, or to the system of working in a factory, or, as here, to the repair of ships in a shipyard. Perhaps it is of peculiar importance where the prescription is contained, not in Acts of Parliament or even in regulations, but in orders D which are not easily accessible to the public, but in order that this principle may be invoked there must be an ambiguity, and, as I have said, though I have felt the force of the argument to the contrary, I have come to the clear conclusion that the licence which the order postulates is a licence in writing. That, however, does not conclude the matter. For I see no reason why in the circumstances of this case the licence in writing should not cover work already done under the oral E sanction of the proper authority as well as work to be done in the future. On this part of the case I do not wish to add anything to what my noble and learned friend will say. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD NORMAND (read by LORD SIMONDS): My Lords, the action was brought by the respondents to recover the sum of £4,371 11s. 7d., the balance F alleged to be due for work done and materials supplied for the repair and alteration of the appellant's vessel M.L. 229. In his original defence and counterclaim the appellant alleged that the sum sued for was excessive and he also claimed damages for alleged failure to complete the repairs and alterations by the contract date. By an amended defence and counterclaim he raised a new issue of law, with which alone this appeal is concerned. He alleged that until Oct. 11, G 1947, the respondents had no written licence from the Admiralty authorising them to carry out the alterations and repairs, and that so much of the claim as related to alterations and repairs carried out before that date was illegal and irrecoverable by virtue of the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940, art. 1, made under reg. 55 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. He also pleaded that although a written licence was granted by the Admiralty on Oct. 11, H 1947, it was a condition of the licence that it should automatically determine if any work not authorised by it was done, and that the respondents, in fact, carried out unauthorised work on the vessel after Oct. 11, 1947, with the consequence that the licence was determined and that so much of the claim as related to repairs and alterations carried out after Oct. 11, 1947, was illegal and irrecoverable. The official referee dealt with the questions raised by the amended defence as a preliminary issue and after hearing evidence he, in effect, sustained the defence and rejected the respondents' claim except certain charges about which he desired to have further information before deciding whether a licence was needed for them. The Court of Appeal has reversed the decision of the official referee.

Regulation 55 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, empowers the competent authority, inter alia, to provide by order for regulating or prohibiting the use of articles of any description and for incidental and supplementary matters. An order made under the regulation may prohibit the doing of anything regulated by the order except under the authority of a licence granted by such authority or person as may be specified in the order. Under this regulation an order was made by the Board of Trade, called the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1939, dated Sept. 4, 1939, but the responsibility for dealing with ships' repairs was subsequently transferred to the Minister of Shipping and, still later, from him to the Admiralty. The order of 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1086) was, accordingly, superseded by an order of the Admiralty of Jan. 31, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 142) substituting the Admiralty for the Board of Trade but not otherwise altering the substance of the earlier order. Article 1 of the order of 1940 provides:

"No person whose business . . . is the repair alteration or dry-docking of ships shall carry out or cause or permit to be carried out in the United Kingdom repairs or alterations to or the dry-docking of ships otherwise than to the order of any department of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom except under the authority of a licence granted by the Admiralty."

This order was revoked by the Restriction of Repairs of Ships Revocation Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 1766) which came into operation on Oct. 1, 1949. The Minister of Shipping on Nov. 17, 1939, authorised surveyors of ships appointed under s. 724 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, to sign on his behalf any licence under the order of 1940 restricting repairs of ships, and the Admiralty on Apr. 26, 1942, granted them the same authority. On June 22, 1942, the Director of Merchant Shipbuilding and Repairs at the Admiralty sent a letter to all licensing officers giving them directions on the policy they were to follow. It contained the following paragraph for their guidance in dealing with applications for licences to execute repairs:

"I understand that it has been made clear to you that where you are dealing with reliable ship repairers and owners with a good record you ought not to delay the putting in hand of obvious repairs, merely pending the actual issue of a licence."

This letter is of administrative effect only and has not the authority of an order made under the Defence Regulations.

The appellant's contract for the repair and alteration of M.L. 229 was originally made in December, 1946, with Boat Construction Ltd. The alterations contemplated were to render the vessel suitable for use, in conformity with Board of Trade requirements, as a passenger carrying vessel. The repairs and alterations were to be carried out, and so far as completed have been carried out, at Falmouth where Mr. Thompson was the Board of Trade surveyor and the licensing officer for the purpose of the order of 1940. The managing director of Boat Construction Ltd., after informing the appellant that a licence would be required, wrote to Mr. Thompson on Feb. 3, 1947, applying for a licence. In his application he detailed the repairs proposed in these terms:

"Remove existing petrol engines and fit two Diesel engines. Carry out necessary repairs and alterations to comply with Board of Trade requirements for st. 3 certificate for 150 passengers."

Mr. Thompson refused to grant a licence at that time because, as he explained, he was short of timber. The ship repairers had, however, sufficient materials in stock to carry on for a time and Mr. Thompson orally authorised them to do so. The respondents were incorporated on Mar. 15, 1947, before the work was begun, and thereafter took over, with the appellant's consent, the contract for the repair and alteration of his vessel. Work began in May, 1947, with Mr. Thompson's knowledge and permission and he or his assistant thereafter frequently and regularly inspected its progress and gave directions how it should be carried on. In October, 1947, the respondents needed to obtain timber for the work and on Oct. 7 they sent to Mr. Thompson a written form of application for a licence "to A complete B.O.T. requirements for modified steam 3 certificate." The estimated cost was stated in the application at £2,500. On Oct. 11, 1947, a licence was granted for "the carrying out . . . of the repairs and alterations and dry-docking of the ship as set out in the . . . form of application." This licence was subject to the condition that it should automatically determine if any unauthorised repairs, alterations or dry-docking were carried out. Thereafter, the respondents B carried out further work under Mr. Thompson's directions, and some of that work (a cocktail bar was mentioned) was suitable for a passenger ship, but was not within the Board of Trade "requirements." Mr. Thompson knew all that was done and he deponed that no unauthorised work was carried out. He also said that the licence of Oct. 11, 1947, was the only licence granted by him, that in his view it had retrospective effect, and that it was not limited to repairs of C the value of £2,500.

My Lords, in the Court of Appeal, BUCKNILL, L.J., and SINGLETON, L.J., held that a licence under the order of 1940 might competently be an oral permission and that it need not be in writing. If that is the true meaning of the order there is no shadow of doubt that all the work done by the respondents was licensed by Mr. Thompson. Even if it is left in doubt whether the licence must be in D writing, the doubt should, especially in a penal order, be resolved in a sense favourable to the freedom of the subject. But I find no ambiguity and I feel myself constrained to differ from BUCKNILL and SINGLETON, L.J.J. In the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 2 (5) (a), a licence is referred to along with a "permit, certificate or other document," and the necessary implication is that a licence within the meaning of this section of the Act is a written docu- E ment, and it should follow that the word is used with the same meaning in orders made under the Act. It is further true that in legislation generally "licence" is the word used for a written authorisation, and that it has come to have the significance of a written document unless there is something to indicate that it may include an oral authorisation. In the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, I think that when "licence" is used it bears the meaning "written licence" and F excludes oral licence. That appears most clearly in reg. 87 (1) where it is associated with "certificate or written permission," and in reg. 88 (1) where "licence . . . or other document" is mentioned. On the other hand, words like "permission" and "leave" are used where the authority may be expressed either orally or in writing. These considerations seem to me to lead to the conclusion that a licence under reg. 55 (1) must be a written licence.

G The next question is whether a licence under the order can be retrospective. This, again, is a question of construction. Counsel for the respondents naturally took the point that retrospective authority is a familiar conception in our law. That is true and not unimportant for this case. But it needs more than this to justify the construing of a licence to carry on an activity otherwise prohibited by statutory order as including a licence with retrospective effect. It would be H a dangerous power to place in the hands of ministers and their subordinate officials to allow them, whenever they had power to license, to grant the licence ex post facto, and a statutory power to license should not be construed as a power to authorise or ratify what has been done unless the special terms of the statutory provisions clearly warrant the construction. There are, however, in my opinion, sufficient indications that reg. 55 (1) is a warrant for an order making provision for licences having retrospective effect. The terms of regulation 55 and the terms of reg. 56A present a somewhat peculiar contrast. Both these regulations are concerned with repair work which may be of the highest urgency in the crises of war, reg. 55, as we have seen, dealing with the repair of ships and reg. 56A with the repair of buildings. Regulation 56A (2) differs from reg. 55 (1) in two important particulars. Under reg. 56A (2) repairs cannot be carried on unless there is a licence "in force" which authorises them. That plainly excludes a licence with retrospective effect. But, then, in order to avoid the possibly disastrous delays which might take place if no work could be done on, for example, a bomb-damaged building till a written licence was obtained, reg. 56A (6) (b) provides a defence if the acts done without authorisation or licence were urgently necessary and were done in circumstances of emergency which rendered it impracticable to obtain an authorisation or licence. It is difficult to resist the inference that the defence of emergency or some equivalent provision was not inserted in reg. 55 or in the orders made under it because it was contemplated that repairs of ships might be undertaken under official supervision subject to a licence to be afterwards granted. A decision in this case that the licence might be retrospective is in no way inconsistent with the contrary decision on the effect of reg. 56A in Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth (4). That brings me to the question whether the licence of Oct. 11, 1947, is retrospective in its effect so as to cover the work done previously. It is not a legal document, it is elliptically expressed and some freedom of construction is justified. It is a licence to complete work begun, and I think that the reasonable construction is that work already done was impliedly covered. There is more difficulty about the cocktail bar which I shall assume was not within the terms of the application and, therefore, not within the terms of the written licence. I think, however, that when the officer authorised to grant licences with retrospective effect comes forward to depone that all the work done in fact had his authority, any defect in the licence which he had power to cure and which ought to have been cured should be disregarded. In such a case, too, I would decline to apply the rule that money cannot be recovered for services given or materials supplied in breach of a statutory prohibition. To do so would be to stretch the precedents beyond reason and to pass from reality into formalism and make-believe.

It would not be respectful to the judgment of DENNING, L.J., to part from the case without referring to the grounds on which he decided in favour of the respondents. The learned lord justice did not decide whether a licence made under the order had to be in writing, nor whether it might be of retrospective effect. He assumed that on a true construction of the order the licence must be a written licence granted before any repair work was begun and that without such a licence the repairers would have been prohibited by the order of 1940 from performing any work on the vessel. But, he said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 542) the order might have been varied without any formality or publicity, and the court should presume from the terms of the letter of June 22, 1942, above referred to, that it had been so varied as to enable oral permission to be given instead of a written licence. With the utmost respect I cannot assent to the argument. There is no ground for thinking that a copy of an order modifying the order of 1940 would have been any more difficult to obtain than the copy of the order of 1940 itself. Such evidence as there is appears to demonstrate that the order of 1940 was the only order in force till it was revoked by the order of 1949. If there had been another order in force it also would have been revoked. Mr. Thompson's evidence, I think, implies that the order of 1940, requiring a written licence, was in force during the execution of the repairs. The appellant in his pleadings expressly relied on that order as the only order in force and there was no repudiation of this in the respondents' pleadings. It is not for the court to presume the existence of orders which are neither pleaded nor proved. The other ground (ibid.) on which the learned lord justice proceeded is that:

"Whenever government officers, in their dealings with a subject, take on themselves to assume authority in a matter with which the subject is concerned, he is entitled to rely on their having the authority which they assume. He does not know, and cannot be expected to know, the limits of their authority, and he ought not to suffer if they exceed it."

A As I understand this statement, the respondents were, in the opinion of the learned lord justice, entitled to say that the Crown was barred by representations made by Mr. Thompson and acted on by them from alleging against them a breach of the statutory order, and, further, that the respondents were equally entitled to say in a question with the appellant that there had been no breach. But it is certain that neither a minister nor any subordinate officer of the Crown can by any conduct or representation bar the Crown from enforcing a statutory prohibition or from prosecuting for its breach. It is, therefore, with regret that I feel unable to accept a short way to a decision which avoids the necessity of construing the order of 1940 and of arriving at the meaning of the word "licence."

B Nevertheless, for the reasons I have given, I would dismiss the appeal.

C LORD OAKSEY (read by LORD RADCLIFFE): My Lords, I agree with the opinions expressed by the noble Lord on the Woolsack and by my noble friend LORD NORMAND, and I only desire to add that I agree also with the rule of interpretation summed up by the noble Lord on the Woolsack in the phrase that a man should not be put in peril on an ambiguity. This rule appears to me to be in accord with the fundamental principle of the criminal law that a man ought not to be convicted of an offence unless it is proved beyond any reasonable doubt that he committed that offence.

D LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinions which have been delivered by my noble and learned friends LORD SIMONDS and LORD NORMAND. I am in full agreement with all that they had said both as to the facts of this case and as to the only principles of law which can properly be brought to bear on them. I do not think it necessary to add anything except that I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

E LORD TUCKER: My Lords, I concur.

Appeal dismissed.

BRIDGMONT v. ASSOCIATED NEWSPAPERS, LTD. AND OTHERS.

(COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Hodson, L.J.J.), June 11, 12, 13, 1951.)

G Libel—Slander—Severance of causes of action—Statement that plaintiff was person referred to in libel—Relevance of statement on question of damages for libel.

H In an action for libel and slander the defendants applied for a severance of the two causes of action on the ground that statements by the author of the alleged libel and another defendant (which statements were pleaded as slanders) that the person referred to in the libel was the plaintiff were irrelevant and inadmissible on the issue of libel.

HELD: the statements were admissible on the issue of libel on the question of damages, and, therefore, there was no ground for severance.

Pearson v. Lemaitre (1843) (5 Man. & G. 700), applied.

Cases referred to:

(1) Spiers & Pond, Ltd. v. John Bull, Ltd., (1916), 85 L.J.K.B. 992; 114 L.T. 641; 18 Digest 204, 1523.

(2) Pearson v. Lemaitre, (1843), 5 Man. & G. 700; 12 L.J.C.P. 253; 1 L.T.O.S. 170; 7 J.P. 336; 134 E.R. 742; 32 Digest 162, 1957.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of SLADE, J., made on May 11, 1951, whereby he ordered that the plaintiff's claim for damages for libel should be tried separately from his claim for slander in the same action.

The alleged libel was contained in an issue of the first defendants' newspaper and consisted of an article written by the second defendant, one Walker, a reporter employed by the first defendants. With regard to the slander, in an interview between the second defendant and the plaintiff, the second defendant was alleged to have spoken words identifying the plaintiff with the person referred to in the article. Two further statements, one made by Walker and the other by the third defendant, in which also the plaintiff was identified with the person referred to in the alleged libel were also pleaded as slanders. For the plaintiff it was contended that the alleged slanders were relevant on the issue of damages for libel, and, therefore, that the two causes of action could properly be tried together. SLADE, J., held that it would be wrong to allow damages for the libel to be increased by reason of the slanders which were also the subject of a claim, because to do so would be to allow damages to be recovered twice over, and, therefore, that the issue of slander was irrelevant to the libel issue and should be tried separately.

Scott Cairns, K.C., and Dennis Lloyd for the plaintiff.

Milmo for the first and second defendants.

John Thompson for the third defendant Wilson.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of SLADE, J., in a case where damages are sought for libel and slander. In his statement of claim the plaintiff claims damages for a libel which appeared in the "Daily Mail," and he also claims damages in respect of three slanders. It is not suggested that there was anything contrary to the rules or improper in the plaintiff joining those claims in his statement of claim as delivered. The application with which we are concerned was that the cause of action for slander should be severed from the cause of action for libel. The master refused to make that order, but, on appeal to the learned judge, he ordered "that the causes of action for slander be tried separately from and immediately after the causes of action for libel (by consent before the same judge) and that the plaintiff have leave to deliver two new statements of claim pleading the causes of action for libel and slander respectively. Existing pleadings to be entirely superseded, and it is further ordered that there be leave to appeal."

The learned judge stated that, although he had exercised his discretion in arriving at the conclusion expressed in the above order, the matter was of some importance on which no authority has been cited apart from R.S.C., Ord. 18, rr. 1, 8 and 9, and a question of principle might be involved. From that order the plaintiff appeals.

The alleged libel is contained in the following paragraph of the statement of claim:

"The first summons in connection with the B.B.C. bribery allegations was served yesterday on Mr. Roy Speer, 38, a senior producer. I understand that three more summonses are due to be issued. One of these affects a television producer; another concerns one of the most famous sound-variety producers now working for the B.B.C.' (meaning the plaintiff)."

There were three defendants, Associated Newspapers, Ltd., the proprietors and publishers of the "Daily Mail", Mr. Walker and Mr. Wilson. Admittedly Mr.

Walker was a reporter employed by the "Daily Mail" and the writer of the article. Mr. Wilson was also a reporter. The first slander alleged is that

A "the defendant Walker, in the course of his employment by the defendant company, falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff . . . the words following or words to the like effect: 'It's you' (meaning the plaintiff) 'we want to see'; 'Have you got anything to say about the news this morning?'; 'We're not really talking about Roy Speer. Didn't you see the announcement in the "Mail" that another radio producer' (meaning the plaintiff) 'and a television producer were also to be issued with summonses?'; 'Well, you' (meaning the plaintiff) 'are the person referred to'."

B The learned judge took the view that what is alleged to have been said on that occasion, though it is denied, was not only wholly irrelevant to any issue which would arise on the libel, but that it would be embarrassing for the jury to have it in their minds, though, no doubt, the learned judge had in mind the fact (with which he is, undoubtedly, very familiar) that cases frequently arise in criminal and civil courts where the jury have to be directed to disregard certain of the evidence which they have heard.

C Counsel for the plaintiff advanced two propositions and, broadly speaking, counsel for the defendants agreed that, if either of those two propositions were established, the appeal must succeed. Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the learned judge was wrong in law in holding that the principal facts as they would emerge in relation to the first and third slanders were irrelevant to the issue on the libel, or, put in another way, if the plaintiff had not added these
D claims in slander he would be entitled to prove the facts on which they are based as relevant to the issue of libel. That was his main point and he put it under two heads. He submitted that the learned judge was wrong in holding that the statement by the writer of the alleged libel that he intended the plaintiff was irrelevant on the issue whether the words in the libel were spoken of and concerned the plaintiff. He admitted that the plaintiff would first have to establish
E that the words as read by the public, or a sufficient section of the public, were to be taken as decisive. I do not want to express any concluded view on that point because, in my view, it is not necessary for the decision of this appeal, and, if it arises, it is a matter which will be open for argument before the learned judge who tries the case. The second head was that the learned judge was wrong in coming to the conclusion that the evidence was irrelevant and inadmissible on F the question of damages. The learned judge said this:

"Some argument was put forward on the basis that it would be proper to introduce the matters complained of in the slander in any event, irrespective of whether the causes of action for slander were left in the libel action or not, and it was suggested that that was a proper ground, indeed, for increasing the damages. I agree that in so far as the publication of other libels or
G slanders is evidence of malice, malice is always a ground for aggravating the damages, but it would be quite wrong in this case to allow the damages for the alleged libel to be increased on the basis that three slanders had been published whilst there was an action proceeding for damages in respect of the very publication of those three slanders, because to do that would be to allow damages to be recovered twice over for the same alleged wrong.
H Secondly, I emphasise that there is no defence raised on the part of any of these defendants in this action which of itself involves proof of an issue of malice, and, therefore, the only possible relevance of malice in this action could be for the purpose of aggravating the damages, not for destroying any defence such as privilege or fair comment."

In Spiers & Pond, Ltd. v. John Bull, Ltd. (1), on which counsel for the plaintiff relied, the plaintiffs were owners and managers of hotels and the defendants were proprietors of the newspaper "John Bull" in which the alleged libel appeared. The alleged libel referred to certain incidents and went on:

"... there are certainly no good or sufficient reasons why the Masonic craft should not protect themselves against being placed in a false position by the employment of Germhun waiters or managers in hotels where they hold their lodge meetings and other 'functions'."

Earlier the newspaper had said:

"Though there may be good and sufficient official reasons for suppressing the name of the hotel—which we know..."

The original interrogatory drafted which was held to be too wide was in these words:

"Do not the words complained of in para. 3 of the statement of claim or some and which of them refer to the plaintiffs?"

The interrogatory allowed was:

"Is not the name of the hotel there referred to, and which you say you know, the Holborn Viaduct Hotel?"

Though SWINFEN EADY, L.J., may have put it more widely, BANKES, L.J., said (85 L.J.K.B. 996):

"The interrogatory in its original form is undoubtedly too wide... A party cannot interrogate his opponent merely as to the meaning of words. In some cases... an interrogatory may be admissible... as to the question of damages."

Counsel for the plaintiff also relied on Pearson v. Lemaitre (2). The rule there laid down by TINDAL, C.J., as stated in GATLEY ON LIBEL AND SLANDER, 3rd ed., p. 626, is this:

"... either party may, with a view to the damages, give evidence to prove or disprove the existence of a malicious motive in the mind of the publisher of defamatory matter; but that if the evidence given for that purpose establishes another cause of action the jury should be cautioned against giving any damages in respect of it. And if such evidence is offered for the purpose of obtaining damages for such subsequent injury it will be properly rejected... upon principle, we think that the spirit and intention of the party publishing a libel are fit to be considered by a jury, in estimating the injury done to the plaintiff; and that evidence tending to prove it cannot be excluded simply because it may disclose another and different cause of action."

Counsel for the defendants did not dispute that in certain circumstances a defendant, in reduction of damages, is entitled to give evidence as to his intention, evidence, as it were, of a kind contrary to that which the plaintiff seeks to bring forward in the present action. He based his submission on the fact that on the pleadings as they are he could not give a notice mitigating damages and he did not intend to do so. He submitted that that being so, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to lead evidence with regard to damages of the kind indicated. I cannot think that that is right, and that the defendant, by not mitigating, can affect the right of the plaintiff, if he has such a right, to lead evidence relevant to damages which might lead to their increase.

The learned judge appears to have based his conclusion that evidence of this kind could not be allowed on the fact that there were these separate counts of slander, but I think the principle laid down in Pearson v. Lemaitre (2) points to a different conclusion. The evidence should not be excluded, but the fact that it has been called may have its repercussion on the damages in respect of the claims for slander. On the other hand, injustice might be done if the mere fact that a slander action had been added precluded the calling of evidence of this kind which would otherwise be material. The plaintiff may primarily want to succeed on his claim for libel, and he ought to be able to call all relevant evidence with regard to that. I agree with the learned judge that there is no issue of malice in the ordinary sense on these pleadings, but that is not necessary on the authorities in order to make this kind of evidence relevant to damages. That being so, there seems to me to be no circumstances which would justify a severance as provided for by the learned judge, and I would allow the appeal and restore the order made by the learned master.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. If it is admissible for a defendant in a libel action to give evidence that he did not intend to refer to the plaintiff, then it must also be admissible for a plaintiff to give evidence that the defendant did intend to refer to him. Such evidence is clearly admissible on damages. It is also admissible on liability where fair comment or privilege is pleaded. I say nothing as to whether it would be admissible on liability where the only issue was whether the words were published of and concerning the plaintiff. It may be so, but for present purposes it is sufficient to say that in nearly every libel action there is the additional issue of damages. It is admissible on that issue in any event. That means that in this case if the libel action were tried separately, evidence of the alleged slanders could be given in that action. The better course, therefore, is to let the whole matter, both the alleged libels and the alleged slanders, be tried in one action.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree. The plaintiff puts the case in two ways. He says, taking his second submission first, that, even if the evidence in relation to the slanders is inadmissible in relation to the libel, there ought not to be a severance. If he succeeded in that contention, I should have been unwilling to reverse the learned judge in the exercise of his discretion. He has also argued, however, that the evidence relating to the slanders is admissible in relation to the libel. That comes under two heads. First, he says the evidence of the slander is admissible to prove subjective intention. Although, as my Lord has pointed out, it is not necessary to give a ruling on this subject, I do not dissent from the opinion of the learned judge that the objective intention of the person who published the words or caused them to be published is wholly immaterial on the question of liability. Under the second head, namely, damages, again I do not dissent from the way in which the learned judge put the matter to the extent that he deals with it on general principles when he says that "in so far as the publication of other libels or slanders is evidence of malice, malice is always a ground for aggravating the damages," but he went on to say that, in his opinion, it would be quite wrong to allow the damages for the alleged libel to be increased on the basis that three slanders had been published while there was an action proceeding for damages in respect of the publication of those very three slanders, because to do that would be to allow damages to be recovered twice over for the same alleged wrong. With all respect to him, I think in making this exception the learned judge is going against the statement of the law as given by TINDAL, C.J., in Pearson v. Lemaitre (2) which seems to me to contemplate exactly that state of affairs. For these reasons, as well as those which have been given by my Lords, I agree that the appeal should be allowed and the order of the master restored.

Appeal allowed.

R. v. GUNewardENE.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Devlin, J.J.), June 4, 13, 1951.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Admissibility—Impeaching credit of witness—Evidence of belief that witness not worthy of credit—Reasons for belief not admissible in examination in chief. A Criminal Law—Evidence—Admissibility—Joint trial—Statement by one prisoner against another—Direction to jury.

The appellant was convicted of the manslaughter of a woman who died after an operation had been performed on her to procure an abortion. The operation was performed by one Mrs. H., who was charged with the appellant and was also convicted. The case for the Crown was that the appellant was an accessory before the fact because after the deceased woman had visited his surgery he had driven her to the house where Mrs. H. carried out the illegal operation. In his defence the appellant denied the charge and pleaded an alibi. It was proposed to call for the defence a doctor to prove that a brother of Mrs. H., who had given evidence for the prosecution which was highly prejudicial to the appellant, ought not to be believed on his oath because he was suffering from a particular mental state, but HILBERY, J., refused to admit this evidence. During the proceedings a statement made by Mrs. H. incriminating the appellant to a considerable extent was read, and it was contended that only such part of the statement as affected Mrs. H. should have been read. B

HELD: (i) the credit of any witness may be impeached by the opposite party by the evidence of persons who swear that, from their knowledge of the witness, they believe him to be unworthy of credit on his oath, but in their examination in chief such persons may not give reasons for their belief, and, therefore, the evidence of the doctor was not admissible. C

(ii) the statement made by Mrs. H. was clearly admissible against her; HILBERY, J., warned the jury that it was not evidence against the appellant; and in the circumstances it was rightly admitted. D

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, Sumatapalage Reginald Gunewardene, a registered medical practitioner, was convicted, together with a Mrs. Alice Louisa Hanson, at the Central Criminal Court, of manslaughter, and was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. The grounds of his appeal were that at the trial HILBERY, J., wrongly refused to admit the evidence of a doctor which was directed to discredit a witness for the prosecution, and that a statement made by Mrs. Hanson which purported to describe the appellant's part in the transaction ought not to have been read except in so far as it affected her. June 13. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at the Central Criminal Court, together with Alice Louisa Hanson, who does not appeal, of the manslaughter of a girl named Grace McLean, and was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. In outline the case for the prosecution was that the dead girl came from Scotland, when she was pregnant, to stay with a Mrs. McKissack, who was a panel patient of and known to the appellant. On Nov. 13 she went to Hanson's house and the latter admitted that she performed an operation on her for the purpose of procuring an abortion, and did procure it by means of a syringe, though this, of course, was not evidence against the appellant. In consequence of the operation a wound was caused in the uterus by the syringe and the wound became septic, with the result that the girl died of general septicaemia. So far as Hanson was concerned, the only question was whether death was the result of the abortion, which we have said she admitted having performed. So far as the appellant was concerned, the case for the Crown was that he was an accessory before the fact, and, therefore, a principal in the second degree. The case made was that he drove the girl, who had visited his surgery, to Hanson's house in order that the operation might be performed on her, and that after the operation he drove her back to Mrs. McKissack's house. The girl was accompanied by a woman referred to as Ann, who went with her into Mrs. McKissack's house, and the appellant followed them a few minutes afterwards. He does not appear to have given any advice or directions that evening, but Mrs. McKissack put the girl to bed and the appellant then left with Ann. The next morning the appellant telephoned to Mrs. McKissack and told her to give the girl a warm bath. He visited her in the afternoon and told Mrs. McKissack to call him back if she wanted him. The girl seemed to get ill during the day, and, as a result of telephone messages, the appellant called between 10 and 11 p.m. and was in the bedroom for some little time. He left and came back about an hour later and stayed till about 1 a.m., when he left saying that he had given her a drug so that she would sleep. In the early morning following the girl was in obvious pain and Mrs. McKissack again telephoned to the appellant. By this time it was clear that the girl was very seriously ill, and, according to the medical evidence, must have been so when the appellant was there at 1 a.m., when she should have been sent to hospital. It was not till about 7 a.m. that the appellant caused her to be taken to hospital, sending a note with her to say that she had had an incomplete miscarriage and retained placenta. In fact, at this time the girl was in extremis and was dead by the time the ambulance reached the hospital.

The police evidence was that at their first interview with the appellant he made a written statement describing how he had been, as he said, called by Mrs. McKissack to the girl just after midnight on Nov. 14-15, and that during that interview and from what he saw the girl had a miscarriage that had appeared to be a normal miscarriage, and he treated her and gave some advice to Mrs. McKissack, but he was sent for the next morning. He came to the conclusion that it was a case of a retained placenta and that she should go to hospital, where he sent her with the note already mentioned. At a subsequent interview, when the police told him that they had ascertained that he had driven the girl to Hanson's house, he admitted it by saying: "On that night I was only fulfilling an obligation by taking them there. I got nothing out of it and certainly did not hand Mrs. Hanson any money." This last observation was because the police told him that it was alleged that the dead girl had paid his secretary £50, of which he had handed £20 to Hanson. He also admitted that he had taken the girl and Ann in his car from Hanson's house back to Mrs. McKissack's flat. The defence was a complete denial of the case made by the prosecution except so far as the appellant admitted attending the girl at Mrs. McKissack's flat, having been sent for by the latter on account of the girl's condition. He denied that he had ever told the police that he had driven the girl to or from Hanson's house, and he called evidence which, had it been believed, was to the effect that he was elsewhere at the time when he was supposed to have been on these journeys. In other words, his real defence was one of alibi at the all-important times. It was not contended that there was no evidence on which a jury could convict, but the two questions which formed the main argument for the appellant were (i) that the judge wrongly refused to admit the evidence of a doctor with a view to discrediting a witness named Davies who had given highly prejudicial evidence against the appellant, and (ii) that the whole of Hanson's statement, which not only admitted her part in the crime, but also set out in detail the appellant's part in it, ought not to have been read so far as concerned those parts which affected the appellant. Some points were taken as to misdirection which, counsel for the appellant frankly admitted, were only minor points, and it is sufficient to say with regard to them that the court is of opinion that not only was there no misdirection but that the learned judge's summing-up was fair and adequate and not open to criticism in any respect.

Dealing now with the first of the main questions argued, the man Davies, who was the brother of Hanson, was called to prove that the appellant had bribed, or attempted to bribe, Hanson to withdraw the statement she had made to the police and to say that she had made it in a moment of panic and that it was untrue. There is no doubt that the evidence of this witness was highly prejudicial to the appellant. He was severely and properly cross-examined with a view to showing that he was not a witness of truth, and he admitted that he had lied on many occasions. His evidence was wholly denied by the appellant, and after his evidence counsel for the appellant desired to call Dr. Leigh to give evidence, as he put it, as to the reliability of Davies as a witness. On counsel for the Crown objecting to this evidence, counsel for the appellant said: "I submit it is admissible on the ground of general reputation for truthfulness and honesty." He had previously told the judge that he intended calling this doctor to give some evidence about the condition of Davies' mind. When HILBERY, J., said that the evidence would not be that of general reputation, counsel for the appellant said: "With respect, reputation. I drop the word 'general'." Later, he said: "I am going to call the doctor to prove whether or not he is suffering from a particular mental state. I propose to ask what that mental state is, what the effect of it is, and the question whether his evidence is to be rejected thereafter is a matter of inference for the jury." HILBERY, J., held that this evidence would be inadmissible, and, accordingly, the witness was not called.

The question raised is of some importance as to the extent to which evidence may be given to discredit witnesses called by the opposing party. That witnesses can be called to say that they would not believe a particular witness called by the other side, whether for the prosecution in a criminal case or for a party in a civil case, is, we think, undoubted, but the nature of the discrediting evidence and how far the witness can go in stating the grounds for his belief are the matters which we have to determine. It does not seem open to doubt that the true rule with regard to the character of a prisoner is that a witness must speak of the prisoner's general reputation and not of particular facts known to the witness on which he bases his opinion. If, for instance, a witness said that he knows nothing of the general character of the prisoner, but that he had had abundant opportunity of forming an individual opinion as to his honesty, such evidence would be inadmissible. That was expressly decided in R. v. Rowton (1), though COCKBURN, C.J. (34 L.J.M.C. 64) there did hold that it is open to a witness to say: "I never heard anything against the character of the person of whose character I come to speak," because the fact that a prisoner's character has never come into issue or discussion may be the most cogent evidence that his reputation is good. The case principally relied on by counsel for the appellant was R. v.

Brown & Hedley (2) where counsel for the defendants proposed to call witnesses to prove that they would not believe the witnesses for the prosecution on their oaths. Counsel for the prisoner cited Mawson v. Hartsink (3) and was then stopped by the court. Counsel for the Crown submitted that to allow such a question would be contrary to R. v. Rowton (1), but the report states (L.R. 1 C.C.R. 71):

A "The court, however, declined to hear any further argument on the subject, observing that all the text-writers were agreed that the evidence could be given, and that the practice was so ancient, and hitherto so undoubted, that it could not be altered now unless by the authority of the legislature."

B That case, therefore, appears to be a direct authority that a witness called to impeach the credibility of previous witnesses can express an individual opinion and is not confined to giving evidence of the latter's general reputation. It is to be observed that in R. v. Rowton (1) counsel for the prosecution is reported as arguing (34 L.J.M.C. 59):

C "There is no distinction in principle between evidence as to the character of a witness and of a prisoner," to which observation COCKBURN, C.J., replied (ibid.):

D "The cases are essentially different. In the case of the character of a witness as to his credibility on oath, the individual opinion of another is what is sought. In such case the witness could not say the general opinion is that the man ought not to be believed on his oath. But in case of a prisoner what is the general opinion of his character is what is to be proved."

E We asked for re-argument in this case with a view to examining other and earlier authorities on the matter and to see if the witness called is confined to stating his individual opinion or whether he may go into any reasons which led him to form that opinion. We need not deal with all the cases to which our attention has been called by counsel on either side. The first case to which we think it necessary to refer is R. v. De la Motte (4), a trial for high treason at which BULLER, J., presided. In his charge to the jury, BULLER, J., said (21 State Tr. 811):

F "These are the three witnesses called to impeach the credit of Lutterloh. The witness Lappel said he rather doubted whether he would trust or believe him. The counsel for the defendant did not put the question in the manner the question always is, and ought to be put, if they mean to impeach the veracity of a witness; and every day's experience teaches the gentlemen at the Bar how they ought to put the question, if they think the answer will serve their purpose; for the question was never asked of any witness, whether he thought this man from his general character, deserved to be believed upon his oath. The only question at all like that was put to Lappel, with this addition, whether he would trust or believe him."

H It would, therefore, seem that the judge's opinion was that a witness called to impeach testimony was confined to giving evidence as to general reputation and could not state his individual opinion. Later cases show that the rule has, at any rate, been relaxed, though LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., seems to have taken much the same view in Mawson v. Hartsink (3), where, after some discussion, he allowed the question to be put in this way (4 Esp. 103):

"Have you the means of knowing what the general character of this witness was? and from such knowledge of his general character, would you believe him on his oath?"

That case was decided in 1802, and two years afterwards, in Carlos v. Brook (5), LORD ELDON, L.C., said that a witness may be asked whether he would believe a man on his oath, but it is not competent to ask him the ground of his opinion. This question was again much discussed in R. v. Watson (6). The main question seems to have been whether, for the purpose of discrediting a witness, it could be asked if he had been convicted of an offence without producing a record of the conviction. That question can no longer arise as the matter is dealt with by s. 6 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1865, usually referred to as Denman's Act. The judgments in R. v. Watson (6) clearly show that all the judges were of opinion that, while a witness can be called to say that he would not believe a previous witness on his oath, he cannot in chief give evidence of particular facts as justifying his opinion. There is certainly nothing inconsistent with this view in R. v. Brown & Hedley (2), and, in our opinion, the effect of the cases is correctly stated in art. 146 of STEPHEN'S DIGEST OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE, 12th ed., p. 168:

"The credit of any witness may be impeached by the opposite party, by the evidence of persons who swear that they, from their knowledge of the witness, believe him to be unworthy of credit upon his oath. Such persons may not upon their examination in chief give reasons for their belief, but they may be asked their reasons in cross-examination, and their answers cannot be contradicted."

The reason for this rule, or rather, for the limitation which is imposed on the evidence that the witness can give, is obvious. Were it otherwise an issue would at once arise whether the facts on which the witness stated he based his opinion were true or otherwise. The issue before the court in a criminal trial is simply whether or not the prisoner has committed the offence with which he is charged. The court cannot at the same time have to try the question whether or not certain facts spoken to with regard to a witness are true or not, nor would there be any means of obtaining the opinion of the jury on that question.

In the present case, had counsel for the appellant called Dr. Leigh, the most that he could have asked him in chief was: "From your knowledge of the witness Davies would you believe him on his oath?" That was not what counsel for the appellant desired to do. He was perfectly frank and told HILBERY, J., that he wished to call Dr. Leigh to say that he, as a medical man, had examined the witness and had come to the conclusion that the man was suffering from a disease of the mind, and that, therefore, he regarded his testimony as unreliable. In our opinion, that is exactly what the cases show cannot be done. A witness can state his individual opinion, but not the facts on which it is founded, and this case is a good illustration for the reason of the limitation placed on this class of evidence. In common fairness to the witness, if that evidence were given, he might have wished evidence called to prove that he was not suffering from any disease of the mind, and the case against the appellant could not be complicated by having a trial of this wholly irrelevant issue as to the sanity or insanity of a particular witness. Perhaps this case does illustrate the desirability of adhering strictly to the rule that a ruling should not be given on the admissibility or otherwise of evidence until the particular question is asked, but, bearing in mind the avowed reason which counsel for the appellant gave for desiring to call the witness we do not, in this particular case, wish to be thought to be making any unfavourable comment on the course adopted. It is abundantly clear that, if the witness had been called, the only object in calling him was to have evidence by a medical man as to the result of an examination he had made of a witness and the opinion he had formed thereon, which, as we have already said, was inadmissible. In our opinion, both on principle and authority, such evidence was inadmissible.

We now turn to the second of the main questions argued on behalf of the appellant. As we have said, there is no doubt that the statement made by the prisoner Hanson incriminated the appellant in a high degree. This is a matter of very frequent occurrence where two or more prisoners are charged with complicity in the same offence. This state of affairs is, no doubt, a ground on which the judge can be asked to exercise his discretion and order a separate trial, but no such application was made in the present case. If no separate trial is ordered it is the duty of the judge to impress on the jury that the statement of one prisoner not made on oath in the course of the trial is not evidence against the other and must be entirely disregarded, and that warning was emphatically given by HILBERY, J., in the present case. It would be impossible to lay down that where two prisoners are being tried together counsel for the prosecution is bound, in putting in the statement of one prisoner, to select certain passages and leave out others. Hanson having pleaded Not Guilty, the prosecution were bound to prove the case against her, and, so far as she was concerned, the evidence mainly consisted in the statement she had made. HILBERY, J., not only warned the jury that they must not regard her statement as evidence against the appellant, but in his summing-up he was at pains not to read the whole of the statement which she had made, confining himself to those parts which bore on her guilt and not on that of the appellant, though he did read one passage which implicated the appellant, again warning the jury that it was not evidence against him. He went so far as to advise the jury not to ask for the woman's statement when they retired, so that they should not have before them matter prejudicial to the appellant. If we were to lay down that the statement of one co-prisoner could never be read in full because it might implicate, or did implicate, the other, it is obvious that very difficult and inconvenient situations might arise. Not infrequently it happens that a prisoner, in making a statement, though admitting guilt up to a certain extent, puts greater blame on a co-prisoner, or asserts that certain of his actions were really innocent and it was the conduct of the co-prisoner that gave them a sinister appearance or led to the belief that the prisoner making the statement was implicated in the crime. In such a case that prisoner would have a right to have the whole statement read, and could, with good reason, complain if the prosecution picked out certain passages and left out others. In this case the statement was clearly admissible against Hanson and was read against her, and, although in many cases counsel for the prosecution do refrain from reading passages which implicate another prisoner and have no real bearing on the case against the prisoner making the statement, we cannot say that anything has been admitted in this case which was not admissible, and HILBERY, J., gave adequate and emphatic directions to the jury on the subject. For these reasons we have come to the conclusion, on both grounds, that the appeal fails and must be dismissed, but in the circumstances the sentence will date from conviction.

Appeal dismissed.

BIRMINGHAM SMALL ARMS CO., LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Tucker), April 11, 12, 16, 17, June 20, 1951.]

Excess Profits Tax—Capital—Computation—“Capital employed in a trade or business”—War damage claim for destroyed machine tools and plant—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), sched. VII, Part II, para. 1 (1) (c). A

On several occasions the factory of a company was severely damaged by enemy action, and it was agreed with the Board of Trade for the purpose of the War Damage Act, 1941, s. 62 (1), that Nov. 22, 1940, should be taken as the date from which interest should accrue in respect of any claim under the Act for compensation for the destruction of machine tools and plant. On Nov. 12, 1945, the amount of the claim was finally agreed by the Board of Trade at £647,012. Payment was made in one sum in March, 1947. In the assessment of the company to excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period beginning Aug. 1, 1940, and ending July 31, 1941, in computing the amount of capital employed in their trade or business, no account was taken of the right of claim to compensation. B

HELD: the claim to compensation was not an asset acquired otherwise than by purchase, the value of which, during the chargeable accounting period in question, formed part of the capital employed in the trade or business of the company, within the meaning of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, sched. VII, Part II, para. 1 (1) (c), and, therefore, it was properly excluded from the computation. C

APPEAL by the Birmingham Small Arms Co., Ltd., from an order of the Court of Appeal, affirming an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated Nov. 2, 1949, dismissing an appeal by way of Case Stated from a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The company claimed that, in computing for the purposes of their assessment to excess profits tax for the year 1940-41 the amount of capital employed in their trade or business, account ought to be taken of an outstanding claim for compensation for loss of machine tools and plant destroyed by enemy action on or before Nov. 22, 1940.

Tucker, K.C., Grant, K.C., and M. L. Lyell for the company.

The Attorney-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.) and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

The House took time for consideration.

A June 20. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, this appeal makes it necessary once more to examine the provisions of that part of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, which imposes excess profits tax and in particular to try to give a satisfactory meaning to the words which occur in Part II of sched. VII to that Act "the amount of the capital employed in a trade or business."

B The facts, which I extract from the Case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, are simple. The appellants owned premises in the Midlands which during the late war were on four occasions bombed by enemy aircraft with the result that a quantity of movable plant and machine tools was completely destroyed. The severest of those raids took place on Nov. 22, 1940, and it was agreed between the appellants and the Board of
C Trade that for the purpose of the War Damage Act, 1941, s. 62 (1), to which I shall refer later, this date should be taken as that from which interest should accrue in respect of any claim established under that Act. Shortly after the loss had occurred, the appellants lodged a formal claim in the prescribed form which was then being accepted in contemplation of the passing of the Act. Difficulties and delays arising out of war-time necessities hindered the formulation and
D agreement of the claim, but it was finally agreed on behalf of the Board of Trade on Nov. 12, 1945. So far as is relevant to the present appeal the agreed claim was (i) for machine tools completely destroyed £498,186, and (ii) for plant completely destroyed £148,826, a total of £647,012. The total cost of the machine tools and plant so destroyed less wear and tear written off was £53,573. Early in 1947 the appellants applied to the Board of Trade for payment of its claim on grounds
E of its business requirements and it was paid in one sum in March, 1947. These are the facts giving rise to the question now to be determined.

In the assessment of the appellants to excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period beginning Aug. 1, 1940, and ending July 31, 1941, no account for the purpose of computing the amount of capital employed in their trade or business was taken of the right of claim to compensation in respect of the war
F damage to which I have referred. For this reason, the appellants appealed against the assessment. They contended in the first place that the sum of £647,012 became a debt due to them within the meaning of para. 1 (1) (b) of Part II of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, as from one or other of several dates, and, alternatively, in the second place, that the right of claim to compensation was an asset acquired otherwise than by purchase within the meaning of
G para. 1 (1) (c) of the same schedule as from one of several dates, and that the value of such asset when it became an asset of the business was £647,012, and that accordingly the said sum should from the appropriate date be included in a computation of the capital employed in the trade or business of the appellants. The Special Commissioners rejected the contention. They held that the claim in question did not assume the character of a debt due to the appellants during the H period in question; that it remained a claim; and that, regarded as an asset, it did not appear to them to be employed in the trade. From their determination an appeal by way of Case Stated was taken to the King's Bench Division and on Nov. 2, 1949, CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dismissed the appeal. Thence an appeal was taken to the Court of Appeal which was duly dismissed, and now an appeal is brought to this House. It is, however, somewhat narrowed down, for the appellants now contend only that the right of claim to compensation falls within sub-para. (1) (c), abandoning the contention that the sum in question was a debt within sub-para. (1) (b), and they contend that the right of claim became an asset of the trade or business on May 31, 1941, the date on which the War Damage to Goods (General) Regulations, 1941 (S.R. & O., 1941, No. 787), were made under the War Damage Act, 1941.

My Lords, it is provided by s. 68 (b) of that Act that the Board of Trade acting in accordance with regulations made by the Treasury may make payments to a person in respect of “war damage occurring to goods which, when the damage occurred, were, or, if the scheme in question had then been in force, would have been insurable in relation to him under either of the schemes, being damage occurring before such date as may be prescribed as the date on which the scheme in question will come into full operation . . .”

The scheme referred to is one under which insurance against war damage was provided for persons carrying on business. There was at first some discussion whether the word “may,” where it occurs in the section, was mandatory or discretionary, but your Lordships were unanimous in thinking that in view of the course which had been taken in the courts below it was not open to the Attorney-General in this case, whatever he might do in other cases, here to argue that the provision was not mandatory. I proceed, therefore (but without deciding it), on the footing that the appellants had a right enforceable in appropriate proceedings to such relief as the section gives. The nature of that relief is clear from the terms of this section. Without its aid, the appellants could claim no relief, for the War Damage Act, 1941, though apparently long in contemplation, was not passed until Mar. 26, 1941, some months after the appellants had suffered damage. In regard to the relief to which the appellants became entitled, it is only necessary to say that it consisted of a right, subject to proof which might be difficult, to an indeterminate sum payable at a future and uncertain date. That was the position during the two months of the relevant accounting period with which alone this appeal is concerned. I will only add one other fact before I turn to the examination of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, viz., that there was no evidence before the Special Commissioners that the right in question had in fact been used (to employ a neutral word) by the appellants.

My Lords, the scope and effect of the excess profits tax which was imposed by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, have been expounded by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Terence Byron, Ltd. (1), in words on which I cannot improve. He said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 638):

“The excess profits tax is charged upon the excess of profits arising in the chargeable accounting period over the standard profits, and standard profits are computed in accordance with s. 13 of the Act. Generally speaking, therefore, once the standard profits have been correctly computed, all that remains to be done in a case where the profits in an accounting period have risen beyond this figure is to charge the prescribed rate of tax on the excess; and thus, in an ordinary case, no question of calculating the capital employed in the trade or business arises. If, however, the average amount of the capital employed in the trade or business in the accounting period is greater, or less, than the average amount of the capital employed therein in the standard period, an adjustment has to be made. If the average amount of such capital is greater than in the standard period, the standard profits are increased in relation to that chargeable accounting period, and if the average amount of such capital has decreased, the standard profits are, in relation to that chargeable accounting period, decreased by the appropriate statutory percentage.”

The question, then, is what was the average amount of capital employed by the trade or business of the appellants during the accounting period, or, more precisely, was it right, in order to bring up that average, to include at any, and what, figure the value of the right to which I have referred for the last two months of the period? The answer to this question turns on the meaning to be ascribed to para. 1 of Part II of sched. VII to the Act. That paragraph provides:

A “(1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this schedule, the amount of the capital employed in a trade or business (so far as it does not consist of money) shall be taken to be—(a) so far as it consists of assets acquired by purchase on or after the commencement of the trade or business, the price at which those assets were acquired, subject to the deductions hereafter specified; (b) so far as it consists of assets being debts due to the person carrying on the trade or business, the nominal amount of those debts, subject to the said deductions; (c) so far as it consists of any other assets which have been acquired otherwise than by purchase as aforesaid, the value of the assets when they became assets of the trade or business, subject to the said deductions.”

B As I have already said, it is now only contended that the amount of the capital employed in the appellants’ business should be enhanced by the value of the right to compensation on the footing that it fell under para. 1 (1) (c) as an asset acquired otherwise than by purchase.

C My Lords, it is plain on the face of this sub-para. (1) that “capital employed” means assets employed. For the capital is something which “consists” of money or “consists” of assets of various kinds. Then by a slight twist the “value” of the assets becomes the “amount” of the capital. It is necessary then to determine what are the assets employed in the trade or business of the person, firm or corporation which carries it on. The case of the appellants, as I understand it, rests mainly, if not entirely, on the contention that in the case of a company carrying on a business all its assets are “employed” in that business unless expressly excluded by the Act—a contention succinctly stated by saying that the capital employed in a business is the same thing as the assets of a business. It was, I think, essential to the appellants’ case to maintain this argument, for the Special Commissioners had found that the right (or “claim” as they called it) regarded as an asset was not employed in the trade. It had, therefore, to be shown either that they were wrong in law because they had misinterpreted the word “employed,” or that there were no facts to support their finding. Thus it was that the appellants formulated the second reason in their formal Case in these words:

F “Because every asset of a trade or business is part of the capital employed in the trade or business unless expressly excepted by statute.”

G My Lords, I see no valid reason for disregarding and giving no meaning to the word “employed.” It was suggested that, inasmuch as the section had to cover the case of an individual or firm as well as that of an incorporated company, it was necessary to use language which would distinguish between the property of the individual or the partners in the firm which was embarked on the trade and that which remained their private concern. This contention appears to me far-fetched and unconvincing. There is no more difficulty in ascertaining what are the capital or assets “of” a trade carried on by an individual or a partnership than “of” a trade carried on by a company; there is just the same difficulty in ascertaining what for the purpose of the excess profits tax is the capital or are the assets “employed” in it. In either case some meaning must be given to the word “employed.” That at least is a cardinal rule of construction. It falls then to the commissioners to determine as a fact whether a right, which I will assume to be an asset belonging to a limited company, is an asset employed in its trade. It cannot be capital employed in its trade unless it is an asset so employed. In the present case, they have held that the right in question was not so employed, and I see no reason for disturbing their findings.

It was urged on behalf of the appellants that the decision of this House in Terence Byron's case (1), to which I have already referred, is inconsistent with this conclusion, and on behalf of the respondents that Northern Aluminium Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) supports it. I do not think that the exact point was decided in either case; if it was, that would be the end of a troublesome question. But in the latter case, though LORD GREENE, M.R., used language suggesting a distinction between assets of a company and assets actually employed in its trade, he was in fact dealing with a very different subject-matter. For during the relevant period there was no legal claim either by or against the company and the contention that an obligation which afterwards came into existence could be written back to an earlier period appeared to LORD GREENE, as it did to this House, to be ill-founded. In the former case, too, the question was a wholly different one. There in the Court of Appeal DU PARCQ, L.J., stated the issue to be whether the facts found in the Case stated by the commissioners justified their conclusion that a damaged theatre, which belonged to the respondent-company, was an asset which had to be included in the amount of capital employed in its trade. It was an asset which had been acquired by purchase and it had been employed in the trade of the company. The commissioners held as a fact that during the relevant period it was still so employed. The decision of the Court of Appeal and of this House was that that finding could not be upset. LORD SIMON observed that an asset might be still employed in the trade though at any moment it might not be actively or productively employed, and on this observation learned counsel for the appellants relied, seeking to deduce from it a general proposition that every asset of the company during the relevant period must necessarily be regarded as an asset employed in its trade whether "actively" or "productively" employed or not. But this is not what LORD SIMON said, nor does it follow from what he said. On the contrary, he appears clearly to have contemplated that different considerations might arise if the company decided to abandon the use of the site instead of re-building the theatre on it. If the case lays down any principle, it is that it is open to the commissioners to find as a fact whether an asset of the company is employed in its trade so that its value must be included in its capital so employed. This appears to me clearly to have been the view taken of similar words in the earlier Act (Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, sched. IV, Part III) by SANKEY, J., in Bourne & Hollingsworth v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3) and Lincoln Wagon & Engine Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4), and I do not find anything in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Gas Lighting Improvement Co., Ltd. (5), which is in conflict with this view. In Liberty & Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6) ROWLATT, J., too, used language consistent only with the possibility of there being assets of a business which yet are not employed in its business for the purpose of computing its capital. I do not think that these cases can be ignored in the consideration of the later Act in which the same language is used.

Finally, my Lords, it was urged on behalf of the appellants that light is cast on the meaning of the words "capital employed in a trade" by the provisions of a later Act, viz., the Finance Act, 1940, s. 27 and s. 34, which, it was said, would be superfluous if it were possible for assets of a company to be otherwise than employed in its trade. Even assuming that this is a case in which it is legitimate to call in aid a later statute for the construction of an earlier one, I cannot accept this contention. Forming the opinion, as I do, that the language of the earlier Act is clear, I cannot be deflected from it unless the later Act unequivocally compels me to do so. But that is by no means the case, for I accept and respectfully adopt the reasoning of SOMERVELL, L.J., and JENKINS, L.J., on this point which shows that on any construction of the earlier Act the provisions of its successor might not be superfluous. I am of opinion for these reasons that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD NORMAND (read by LORD TUCKER): My Lords, I agree with the result at which the Court of Appeal arrived. But I have difficulty in agreeing with the reasoning, for I am respectfully of opinion that para. 1 (1) of Part II of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, does not call for an inquiry whether an asset (within the meaning of the paragraph) was "actively" employed in the company's trade or business in the relevant year. That was, it humbly appears to me, settled by this House in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Terence Byron, Ltd. (1). In that case the asset had previously been "actively employed" and would in some future year again be "actively employed" in earning profits for the company, but it had been so damaged by fire as to be incapable of use in the accounting year. Yet this is a question of construction, and if it is irrelevant to inquire whether a pre-existing asset, not abandoned, but unusable in the accounting year, was "actively" employed in the company's business in that year, it must equally be irrelevant to inquire about an asset which came into being in the accounting year whether it was "actively" employed. It is said that SANKEY, J., and ROWLATT, J., in three cases under similar provisions of the legislation of 1915 (Bourne & Hollingsworth v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3), Lincoln Wagon & Engine Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4) and Liberty & Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6)) took the view that the words "employed in" meant "actively employed in." If it be so, I cannot reconcile this view with the reasoning of LORD SIMON in Terence Byron, Ltd. (1). But it is more than doubtful if SANKEY, J., or ROWLATT, J., held the view attributed to them, and I refer to the explanation of the cases which will be given by my noble and learned friend LORD RADCLIFFE, whose opinion I have had the advantage of reading in print. The Attorney-General, however, argued that the language of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Northern Aluminium Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), showed that, notwithstanding the earlier decision of this House there was still room for an inquiry whether the asset was "actually" employed. In that case the question was whether a sum paid by the company to the Ministry of Aircraft Production in 1943 was "a sum in respect of accruing liabilities" and deductible under the Finance Act, 1940, s. 34 (4), in computing the capital of the company for the chargeable accounting period ended on Dec. 31, 1941. The sum in question was paid under an agreement, made in 1942, which provided that part of the price charged by the company for its products in 1941 should be repaid to the Ministry. It was held that it was not deductible. It was not a sum paid in respect of a debt in existence in the accounting year, but a sum originating in a subsequent arrangement and falling to be artificially attributed to the accounting year and written back into the accounts. The language used by the Master of the Rolls points the contrast between a real debt existing in the accounting year and a debt artificially referable to it, and is not directed to or concerned with a contrast between an existing asset actively employed in the business and an existing asset lying inactive in the relevant period.

I think, nevertheless, that the appeal must fail. The purpose of the provisions of para. 1 (1) of Part II of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, is to prescribe a measure of "the amount of the capital employed in a trade or business (so far as it does not consist of money)" in the relevant year. It applies to capital employed, not only by incorporated companies whether carrying on one or more trades or businesses, but also by partnerships and by individuals. The words "employed in" are not otiose, for it might be necessary to determine what capital was employed in one of two trades or businesses carried on by the company, or what part of the capital of a partner was employed in the partnership business, or what part of the individual's capital was employed in his trade or business. The provisions of the paragraph deal with the assets of which the capital employed in the trade or business consists, and it deals with them exhaustively. Apart from money, these assets are divided into (a) assets acquired by purchase, (b) assets being debts due to the person carrying on the trade or business, and (c) any other assets acquired otherwise than by purchase. The appellants' contention is that "assets" include every item of property of every kind which may be made available to satisfy the debts of the owner of the assets, and that (apart from money) every item of property, including every chose in action belonging to the company, which does not fall under heads (a) or (b) of the sub-paragraph, necessarily falls under head (c). In this case we are asked to treat as capital employed in the trade or business an asset consisting of a claim to money which is not a debt and which, therefore, does not fall within head (b). It is a claim that might and later did ripen into a debt, and it is capable of being valued, though the amount which would become payable and the date at which it would become payable were in the accounting year unknown and uncertain. It is also a very unusual sort of asset because it is not a money claim arising from the business activities of the company or from the employment of its other assets, but a claim created by the gratuitous grant of Parliament. I think it is not an asset of the kind contemplated by the provisions under consideration. Money claims, if they are debts, fall under head (b), and I am not satisfied that a claim to money, not being a debt, has any place among the assets of which "the capital employed in the trade or business" consists. In the course of the debate the company's power to call up uncalled capital was referred to. That is a chose in action and it is an asset in the sense that it is available for the satisfaction of the company's debts, but it is difficult to think that it is among the "assets" falling under head (c) and part of the capital employed in the business. Similarly, a contested claim to damages, even if it is capable of being valued, seems not to fall under head (c), and not to be part of the capital employed in the business. Those and the present claim have a common character as claims to money which are not debts and they do not appear to be within any of the heads of the sub-paragraph. On that ground, I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD OAKSEY (read by LORD RADCLIFFE): My Lords, I have felt much difficulty in this case. Unfortunately, two cases which appear to me to have a possible bearing on the decision were not cited, viz., Gliksten (J.) & Son v. Green (7) and Rownson, Drew and Clydesdale, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (8). It might, I think, have been argued that the sum which the Crown must be assumed to have undertaken to pay to the appellant company for the stores and tools destroyed represented those tools, and that the payment, when made, was referable to the accounting period during which the tools were destroyed, but, on the whole, I am not prepared to dissent from the conclusions at which your Lordships have arrived.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, the decision of the Special Commissioners was that the appellants' claim did not assume the character of a debt during the accounting period, and that, regarded as an asset, it did not appear to be employed in their trade. As it is not now contended that this claim can be called a debt within the meaning of Part II of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, the sole question that remains is whether the commissioners' decision to reject the company's appeal ought to be reversed by the court on the ground that there is something impugnable in law in their finding that the claim did not appear to be employed in the company's trade during the relevant period. Your Lordships were invited to dispose of this appeal on the basis that a question whether a particular asset is or is not employed in a trade is a question of fact, and that there was in this case evidence before the commissioners which permitted them to find as they did. More than one reason prevents me from proposing that we should dismiss the appeal on this ground. The first objection is that the meaning of the word "employed" as found in the Act must be a question of law depending on the construction of the Act of Parliament. On one view of its meaning, there was evidence before the commissioners which would support their decision, but on another view, not. But, apart from this, I feel bound to point out that the commissioners' decision does not apply the true statutory test. The test in computing capital is not whether an asset belonging to the proprietor of a business is employed in his business or not, but whether there is capital employed in his business consisting of this or that asset. In many cases, there is

- A no difference at all between the two questions: in a few cases the difference may be important. But to treat them as the same question does tend to lead to a confusion that has not been absent from the arguments in this case, for, whereas once capital has been introduced into a business it may naturally be regarded as still employed in it until such capital is lost or withdrawn, I have not been able to bring to my mind any clear conception of what is meant by an asset
- B being employed in a business if it means something different from merely belonging to it. Your Lordships have been, in effect, invited to say that there is some pregnant meaning that should be attached to the word "employed" in this connection. I do not think that I am being unfair to the argument of the respondents if I say that we were not presented with any set of words which were capable of defining what that pregnant meaning might be, apart from the
- C suggested interpretation of the word "employed" as meaning "actively or productively employed during the accounting period" which has already been rejected by this House in the Terence Byron case (1). In those circumstances, I think it too large an assumption that the commissioners placed some construction on the word "employed" which both imported something different from the mere word "of" and also was supported by the bare statement of facts that was
- D before them. It seems to me that the more satisfactory course is to treat this question as one that is open to your Lordships. In doing so, we should be following the same course as that which was taken by all the members of the Court of Appeal.

My Lords, I do not think that the words "capital employed in a trade or business" bear any significant difference of meaning from the words "capital of a trade or business." I stress, of course, that we are dealing with the capital of a trade or business and not the capital of its proprietor. He, or, in the case of a company, it, may, obviously, own capital or assets that are not the capital or assets of his or its trade or business. But, with that out of the way, I do not see what other distinction remains. After all, the word "employed" is no novelty in this connection. It was first used, in reference to excess profits duty, in the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, s. 41, and it was there introduced for the purpose of computing increases or decreases of capital where capital had been introduced in the course of an accounting period. But the conception of the capital of a trade or business itself had already been formed by the preceding section, s. 40, where the legislature had spoken of "... the statutory percentage on the capital of the trade or business as existing at the end of the last pre-war trade year" (sub-s. (2)) and had directed that the provisions contained in Part III of sched. IV to the Act should have effect "with respect to the ascertainment of capital for the purposes of this Part of this Act." Part III of that schedule, when referred to, is the counterpart, though not the exact equivalent, of Part II of the schedule now before us. It begins "The amount of the capital of a trade or business shall, so far as it does not consist of money, be taken to be

H ... " The word "employed," as I have said, comes in in s. 41. It is introduced in this way:

"(1) Where capital has been increased during the accounting period, a deduction shall be made from the profits of the accounting period at the statutory percentage per annum on the amount by which the capital has been increased, for the whole accounting period if the increased capital has been employed for the whole accounting period ..."

There follow provisions for decrease of capital (sub-s. (2)), for explaining what is meant by increase or decrease of capital (sub-s. (3)), and for the special case of capital which is not immediately remunerative (sub-s. (4)). Throughout this section the word "employed" is used in reference to capital, but I take it to be clear that it is not introduced with the purpose of drawing any distinction between the various kinds or measures of use to which assets may be put once capital of the business has come to consist of them. They themselves may be money, or debts, or real or personal property, but, if they represent a form in which capital of the business has clothed itself for the time being, no further question needs to be asked as to the nature of their contribution at any particular period to the conduct of the business. Perhaps I may add that the legislature by s. 42 even sharpened the point by making special provision for a "... class of trade or business in which the amount of capital actually employed in the trade or business is, owing to the nature of the trade or business, small compared with the capital necessarily at stake for that trade or business ..."

I can see some difficulties in the working out of that distinction and in the determination of what is "actual" employment, but at least I think that it is fair to say that a reading of the old Act gives no support for the view that the legislative scheme envisaged any distinction between the conception of capital of a trade or business and capital employed in a trade or business.

Your Lordships were referred during the course of the argument to a group of decisions which were given with reference to the old Act. These decisions were the Bourne & Hollingsworth case (3), the Lincoln Wagon & Engine Co., Ltd. case (4), the Gas Lighting Improvement Co., Ltd. case (5), and the Liberty & Co., Ltd. case (6). The first three were decisions of SANKEY, J.: the last a decision of ROWLATT, J. I do not myself find any assistance at all in those cases. The only real issue in all of them was whether the court should upset or uphold findings by the commissioners that certain assets were "investments" within the meaning of the Act. That does not bear on our present problem. It is true that, in his cases, SANKEY, J., directed himself to considering the question whether the assets were capital employed in the business and thought in two out of three cases that they were not. It is not necessary to say whether his conclusions on the facts would commend themselves if they were re-argued. The only thing that matters is that in none of his judgments does he appear to be drawing any distinction between what is capital of a business and what is capital employed in a business. I do not think that he regarded the two phrases as having any difference of meaning, for he uses them as if they were interchangeable with each other. The Liberty & Co., Ltd. case (6), which ROWLATT, J., decided, offers, I think, no more assistance than the others. The learned judge was directing himself to the question whether certain investments reserved for future building represented capital that had ever been put into the business at all. He thought that they did not, because they had never been, as it were, devoted to the purposes of the business: the fund was "not tied up in any sort of way." Here, again, I can find no hint of a distinction between what was capital of the business and what was capital employed in the business. He did not, apparently, regard the investments as a form of either.

Excess profits tax was imposed by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939. Certainly there are differences in the wording of the new enactment and the scheme is not in all respects the same as the old. But I think that it would take a good deal of argument to demonstrate that "capital employed in a trade or business" in sched. VII to this Act has some meaning ascertainably distinct from "capital of a trade or business," if the two phrases were, as I think, interchangeable under the former Act. In the body of this Act "capital employed" has become what I may call the standard phrase, though "capital" is occasionally referred to without more. Also in Part II of sched. VII the computation provision now starts "Subject to the provisions of this Part of this schedule, the amount of the capital employed in a trade or business . . ." It seems to me very unlikely that the change is significant. There are, at any rate, some indications as to the range of meaning which the words "capital employed" permit. Such capital may consist in part of moneys not required for the purposes of the trade or business (para. 3 of Part II of sched. VII), since such moneys are to be left out of account in the computation of capital, and there would be no need to provide that they are to be left out of account if they were not in themselves within the meaning of the words. This form of construction is that already applied by your Lordships' House in the Gas Lighting Improvement Co., Ltd. case (5). Secondly, capital employed may consist of assets that are "inherently unproductive" (the Finance Act, 1940, s. 34 (1)) or of assets the whole of the value of which has been permanently lost (s. 27 (5) of the same Act). I think that this Act, which is part of the same legislative scheme and was passed in the following year, may properly be referred to in order to aid the construction of the Act of 1939. Even without the advantage of authority, I should have concluded from these indications and the legislative history of the words "capital employed" that they were used in the present Act without any reference to the actual use made of particular assets during a particular period, once it could be said of them that they were a form of capital which had been put into the business. But to say that is, as I see it, only to repeat what has already been decided by your Lordships' House in the Terence Byron case (1), in which it was held that the capital expended in acquiring a site with a theatre on it was not the less employed in the business because the site had become during the period in question a vacant piece of land with nothing but the ruins of a theatre to encumber it. The essential difference between that case and this lies in the fact that there it was never in doubt that the capital had been put into the business. What was in doubt was whether it was still there.

The only other decision that I need notice is that given by the Court of Appeal in the Northern Aluminium Co.'s case (2), and later approved by this House. The language of the Master of the Rolls was much canvassed before us. I do not think that it has any bearing on the true problem in this case. Phrases occur such as "actually earning profits", "actually employed", but, throughout, the Master of the Rolls is concerned to insist on the difference between an actual liability and a notional liability, between an asset that really exists and an asset that has only an artificial or notional attribution to a particular period. All that would be very relevant if we were being invited to treat the £647,012 paid in 1947 as if it were part of the capital in 1941. But that is not what we are asked to do. We are asked to treat the claim as part of the capital in 1941, whatever its value as a claim might be. That claim was no notional or artificial entity in 1941. It existed as a statutory recognition of the company's right to indemnity, and, on the basis that this appeal is argued before us, that right was capable of legal enforcement. I do not think that LORD GREENE's language is applicable to this state of affairs.

What, then, are we to make of the appeal? My Lords, I do not think that the answer depends on any special meaning of the word "employed." It seems to me that the appeal fails because the appellants' argument really amounts to the assertion that the mere fact that the company owns an asset involves the consequence that there is some capital of its business consisting of that asset. And that I regard as a fallacy. No doubt this claim is in a sense an asset, but that does not conclude the matter. For the purpose that we are dealing with, "capital" is an abstraction and an "asset" is a form in which it consists from time to time. Normally, an asset only belongs to a business because capital has been expended in acquiring it or creating it. That is as true of trade debts as of other kinds of asset. Of course capital may be put into a business in kind in the shape of an asset which is directly contributed, but, if that is to be the way in which capital of a business is to be increased, I do not think that it can possibly be said to have happened until some actual form of property has been placed within the control of the business. But lest I go too far, I will content myself with saying that no part of the capital employed in this business in the accounting period consisted of this claim, which was at that date uncertain as to the amount that it would produce or the year in which it would be paid. A case of this sort is quite exceptional. The asset is, as it were, voted by Parliament, but it remains a vote until the claim is recognised and paid. We treat it as a chose in action for the purposes of this case, but I would think it very unsafe to suppose that every chose in action which belongs to the proprietor of a business in connection with it is a form of capital employed in his business. Is uncalled share capital capital employed in a company's business? I should have thought not. Yet it is a chose in action and money can be raised on it. If money is so raised, I should have thought that it is that money that forms the capital employed in the business rather than the chose in action; but I do not think it necessary to try to solve these difficult points for the purposes of this case. I wish merely to guard myself against the assumption that the question whether there is capital employed in a business can be solved by ascertaining that its proprietor has become possessed of a chose in action in connection with it, or by describing that chose in action as an asset. Indeed, an asset is an elusive word in business or company matters. For the purposes of a balance sheet it is often no more than a record of expenditure, such as "development expenditure" or even "deficit on profit and loss account." Both of these items may properly take their place on the "assets" side of a company's balance sheet, yet I do not think that anyone would argue that they are forms of "capital employed" for the purposes of excess profits tax. For these reasons, which I am afraid that I have expressed at undue length, I agree that this appeal must fail. I believe that my reasons are, in substance, those that prevailed with the Court of Appeal, but, in view of the possibilities of confusion which are contained in the finding of the Special Commissioners, I have thought it well to set out my reasons at length.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, I agree with those of your Lordships who consider that authority, as well as the legislative history of the words "capital employed," point to the conclusion that in their present context they do not refer to the actual use made of a particular asset in the relevant accounting period once it is shown to have been a form of capital put into the business and still there. I also agree for the reasons which have been stated by my noble and learned friend LORD NORMAND that a money claim, such as the present, not being a debt does not come within any of the heads of para. 1 (1) of Part II of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, and that for this reason this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. JUDGE PUGH. Ex parte GRAHAM.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Devlin, JJ.), June 14, 1951.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Apportionment—Refusal to determine application—Building comprising two flats—Letting after Sept. 1, 1939—Standard rent fixed by rent tribunal—Alleged prior letting as one house before Sept. 1, 1939—Subsequent application for apportionment—Duty to hear and determine application—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (3)—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 1 (1).

The tenants of two flats in one building applied under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), to a rent tribunal to reduce their rents, alleging that the flats were separate dwelling-houses first let after Sept. 1, 1939, and they obtained reductions in the rents from £200 to £125 each. Subsequently, one of the tenants applied to the county court to fix the rent of his flat by apportioning the rent of the whole building which he now alleged had been let as a single dwelling-house before Sept. 1, 1939. The county court judge held that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the application on the ground that to do so would involve his acting as a court of appeal from the rent tribunal, or, if he held the tribunal had no jurisdiction, abrogating the prerogative rights of the divisional court to supervise inferior tribunals.

HELD: the claim before the county court that the tribunal had fixed the rent was matter, not of jurisdiction, but of defence; the county court judge should have investigated whether or not the house fell to be dealt with by the tribunal, and, if not, should have apportioned the rent; and, therefore, an order of mandamus would issue directing him so to do.

MOTION for mandamus.

The applicant was the tenant of one of two flats contained in one building. The rent of the flat having been fixed by a rent tribunal on the tenant's application, he applied to the county court to fix the rent by apportioning the rent of the whole building which he alleged to have been let as a whole before Sept. 1, 1939. The county court judge refused to hear the application on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to entertain it as the rent had been fixed by the rent tribunal. The applicant contended that that was a matter, not of jurisdiction, but of defence, and that the county court judge should have investigated whether the rent tribunal had had jurisdiction to fix the rent, and, if not, he should have fixed it himself by making the apportionment.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an application for an order of mandamus directed to the judge of the Bloomsbury County Court directing him to hear and determine an application made under s. 12 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which provides for the apportionment of the rent of a dwelling-house.

In September, 1950, there were two separate tenants of flats known as 20a and 20b, Buckland Crescent, Hampstead, and those tenants took proceedings before the local rent tribunal, claiming that the rents were excessive and ought to be reduced. Those proceedings were under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), under which the tribunal has jurisdiction, where the standard rent of a dwelling-house is the rent at which it was first let after Sept. 1, 1939. The case was put to the tribunal by the present applicant and the tenant of the other flat on the footing that these were two separate dwelling-houses, and that they were first let after Sept. 1, 1939. On those facts, the tribunal had jurisdiction and they reduced the rent of the applicant's flat from £200 to £125. Since then the applicant thinks he has discovered facts—whether he is right or wrong will have to be determined hereafter—which show that before Sept. 1, 1939, these two separate flats were let as one. He alleges that nothing has been done structurally to alter the building which comprises the flats, and so, for the purpose of the Rent Restrictions Acts, they are still one dwelling. If that were the case, the applicant would be entitled to apply to the county court for an apportionment of the rent of the whole premises. That is what he did, in the hope, no doubt, of obtaining a further reduction of rent.

When the matter came before the county court judge, he was informed of the proceedings before the rent tribunal, and he refused to hear the case, taking the view that he was being asked to act as a court of appeal from the rent tribunal or to hold that the rent tribunal had no jurisdiction. He also said that, if he gave a decision apportioning the rent, there would be two standard rents, the first depending on his decision and the second depending on that of the tribunal. Accordingly, he declined jurisdiction. I feel bound to say that I think he was wrong. I think the fundamental error which underlies this case is that matters were treated as going to jurisdiction which were really matters of defence. When the case comes to be heard it will be open to the landlord to say, if he can, that there always were two dwellings, and, therefore, there is no rent of a single dwelling to apportion between the two flats. The county court judge will then have to decide whether before Sept. 1, 1939, or before this letting there were two dwellings or only one. If there was only one, prima facie there has to be an apportionment of the rent. If the judge is met with the objection that this matter has been adjudicated on by the Hampstead rent tribunal, the question will have to be litigated whether the tribunal had jurisdiction, because such a tribunal can only give a valid decision if it has jurisdiction to enter on the inquiry. The parties, by their action, cannot give jurisdiction to a tribunal, and, as WILLES, J., said in his speech advising the House of Lords in London Corp'n. v. Cox (1) (L.R. 2 H.L. 262):

“If the decision were in favour of the plaintiff it is still not conclusive because ‘the rule, that in inferior courts and proceedings by magistrates the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta does not apply to give jurisdiction, never has been questioned’.”

Therefore, it seems to be clear that where the decision of an inferior court is relied on as conclusive it must be shown by the person who relies on that decision that the court giving it had jurisdiction. A case which has recently been dealt with, more particularly in the judgment of DEVLIN, J., in R. v. Fulham, Hammer-smith & Kensington Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Zerek (2), is Briscoe v. Stephens (3). The judgment in that case shows clearly enough that, if the decision of an inferior court is pleaded as estopping the plaintiff from proceeding, the defendant must first show that the inferior tribunal had jurisdiction. The plaintiff can reply that there was no jurisdiction, and then the case has to be fought out.

A In my opinion, therefore, the county court judge is bound to hear this application for apportionment of the rent. The landlord may argue that there is nothing to apportion because these two flats were never one dwelling-house. If he fails on that, or if it is shown that the applicant's flat was let before Sept. 1, 1939, he will be in considerable difficulty because the tribunal would have no jurisdiction as they can only deal with cases in which the first letting was after Sept. 1, 1939. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the order of mandamus must go.

B LYNSKEY, J.: I agree. I only desire to add that I think the course taken in this case on behalf of the landlord before the learned county court judge was wrong. He objected to the jurisdiction. In my view, this was not a matter going to jurisdiction. If there had been, as there may have been, a valid decision of the rent tribunal which fixed the standard rent at a lower figure than it was thought to be, that was a matter of defence and not a matter going to jurisdiction. If that defence had been pleaded, the judge would have had to investigate whether there was a letting prior to Sept. 1, 1939, and, if there had been, he would have had to apportion the rent. If he was satisfied that there had not been a letting of these premises before Sept. 1, 1939, the standard rent would have been fixed, and he would not have been called on to apportion it because there was no necessity to do so. These are matters of defence, and do not go to jurisdiction. In those circumstances, the judge ought to have entertained the application, and, therefore, the order of mandamus ought to go.

D DEVLIN, J.: I agree, and I desire to add only a word in relation to one reason which was given by the judge for not hearing the matter. He says:

“Nor could I listen to any argument that the above conditions had not been fulfilled and that the tribunal had acted without jurisdiction, for that would be to abrogate to myself the prerogative rights of the Divisional Court to supervise inferior tribunals”.

E I think that that shows a misunderstanding of the nature of the powers which the court exercises by way of certiorari and mandamus. They are not in any sense exclusive powers. They are powers which the court exercises to give a speedy remedy against obvious excesses of jurisdiction. The authorities to which my Lord has referred make it clear that when any question is raised as to the jurisdiction of an inferior court—that is, a court with limited jurisdiction—that question must be tried by the court before whom it is raised. I agree, therefore, F that it was the duty of the judge to deal with this matter, not as a point of jurisdiction, but as a matter raised by way of defence in the course of the hearing of the action.

NATIONAL COAL BOARD v. J. E. EVANS & CO. (CARDIFF), LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Singleton and Morris, L.J.J.), June 12, 13, 1951.]

*Trespass—No fault in defendant—Accidental damage to underground electric cable—
Cable laid by plaintiffs' predecessors without knowledge of owner of land—Excavation by contractors employed by owner of land—Damage caused during excavation.* A

The first defendants, who had obtained a contract from a county council to erect workshops on land belonging to the council, sub-contracted with the second defendants to excavate a trench across the land for drainage purposes. Without the knowledge of the council the plaintiffs' predecessors had placed an electric cable under the land, running across the line of the proposed trench at the same depth as the trench would be at that spot, and carrying electric current to a colliery belonging to the plaintiffs. The first defendants had been supplied by the council with a plan of the land showing the line of the required trench, but the underground cable was not marked on it, and neither the first defendants nor the second defendants knew of its existence. During the course of the excavation, a mechanical excavator, driven by a workman employed by the second defendants, broke the concrete cover of the cable and damaged the cable, but it was thought at the time that no serious damage was done. The clerk of works of the county council was informed of the accident, but the council did not inform the plaintiffs. As a result of the accident water seeped through the insulating cover of the cable and an explosion occurred and cut off the electric supply carried by the cable. The plaintiffs brought an action against the first and second defendants alleging trespass and negligence. On the facts it was found that the defendants were not guilty of negligence. B C D

HELD: as the plaintiffs were at fault in the matter, the accident being attributable mainly to the conduct of their predecessors in placing the cable on the council's land without the knowledge of the council, and as the defendants were entirely free from fault, having merely done what they were required by the council to do, there was no trespass by them. APPEAL by the defendants from an order of DONOVAN, J., dated Dec. 20, 1950, whereby he held the defendants liable for trespass to an electric cable, the property of the plaintiffs, which was sunk under land which was the property of the Glamorgan County Council. The first defendants were contractors engaged by the council to do certain work on the land and the second defendants were sub-contractors engaged by the first defendants to cut a trench across the land for drainage purposes. Neither defendants knew that the electric cable ran under the land, and it was accidentally damaged during the excavation by a H mechanical excavator driven by a workman employed by the second defendants. The county council were informed of the fact, but the plaintiffs were not informed. Some months later, as a result of the damage to the cable, the electricity supply carried by the cable failed. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for trespass and negligence. The learned judge found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendants, but he held that their absence of knowledge in regard to the cable was no defence against the allegation of trespass, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs on that claim. The facts appear in the judgment of COHEN, L.J.

Sutton, K.C., and D. Meurig Evans for the first defendants.

Sutton, K.C., and Pennant for the second defendants.

Lloyd-Jones, K.C., and Wallis-Jones for the plaintiffs.

COHEN, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of DONOVAN, J., given at Glamorganshire Assizes on Dec. 20, 1950, by which he held both defendants liable for damages for an alleged trespass to a cable, now the property of the plaintiffs, which was sunk under land, the property of the Glamorgan County Council. The judgment of the learned judge was a reserved judgment and it states very conveniently and clearly the facts and the conclusions which he had reached, and in my statement of the facts I shall follow what he said.

In August, 1948, the first defendants secured from the county council a contract to erect new workshops at the School of Mines, Treforest, Pontypridd. The work to be done included the cutting of a trench for drainage purposes from the new workshops across land occupied by the School of Mines to a manhole just outside that land. According to a plan put in, the trench had to be between 150 and two hundred yards long. The ground under which the drainage was to be sunk adjoined a lane at the back of houses in a street called Brook Street. The first defendants sub-contracted with the second defendants for the excavation of this trench. The first defendants were supplied with a plan by the county council for the purpose of the work that they had to do. This plan showed the line of the required trench, but did not show that an underground cable, the property of the plaintiffs and carrying electricity at a pressure of thirty-three thousand volts, ran under the land athwart the line of the proposed trench at a depth of three feet, the same depth, that is, as the trench would be where it met this cable. In September, 1948, the first defendants marked out for the second defendants the line of the required trench, and, in the same month, the latter commenced to dig out the excavation with a mechanical excavator. What happened thereafter, as found by the learned judge, is as follows. When the excavator was digging the trench in the autumn of 1948, it hit and broke the concrete cover of the cable and hit the cable itself, causing the damage which eventually broke the circuit. The driver of the excavator knew at the time what he had done. Mr. Weeks (the clerk of works of the Glamorgan County Council, who was in charge of the works on the site) and Mr. Dimmick (the manager of the second defendants) knew what had happened on the same day or very shortly afterwards. Neither Mr. Weeks, Mr. Dimmick, nor the driver thought that any real harm had been done to the cable, and, therefore, did not report the matter with a view to the facts being brought to the notice of the cable owners. This incident having happened, the cutting of the trench continued to its end, an earthenware drainpipe was laid in it, and the trench filled in. Nothing further happened until May, 1949, when the electricity supply carried by the cable failed. When the fault was located—that, apparently, was a troublesome matter—and the cable exposed, it was found that it had been damaged in such a way that, during the ensuing months, water had seeped slowly through the insulating cover and had eventually come into contact with the live core of the cable, causing an explosion which blew a hole in the cable and cut off the current. This was the result, as the learned judge found, of damage done to the cable in the previous autumn when it was hit by the excavator.

Those being the facts, the plaintiffs commenced proceedings against the defendants on Nov. 22, 1949. Their statement of claim, delivered on Jan. 9, 1950, stated the facts and alleged trespass and negligence. Paragraph 4 contained the particulars of negligence which were as follows:

"(a) Neither of the defendants took any or any effective measures to discover whether there was any electric cable in the way of their excavations. (b) Neither of the defendants took any steps to prevent damaging objects buried beneath the surface. (c) The defendants worked or controlled the mechanical excavator so unskilfully that it damaged the said electric cable."

In para. 5 this allegation was made:

"Although both defendants knew that the said cable had been seriously damaged in or about September, 1948, neither of the defendants gave any notice of such happening to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs knew nothing of the matter until May 3, 1949, when, by reason of the foregoing damage and the consequent deterioration of the cable through the seeping in of water and otherwise, the cable broke down and the electric current was cut off."

The plaintiffs then gave particulars of their damage, which came to some £598. The learned judge dealt, first, with the issue of negligence and said:

"The plan received by the first defendants from their principals, the Glamorgan County Council, showed no electric cable beneath the land in question. Usually, as one would expect, all underground cables are shown on the contract plans to which the contractor has to work. To the extent that no such cable is shown on the plan, the practice of contractors is to assume that none exists, unless of course there is some evidence on the site visibly contradicting the plan in this respect. This attitude seems to me to be reasonable, and, indeed, the plaintiffs do not assert the contrary. But, it is said, there was evidence visible on the site of an underground cable. There was an electric pylon on the same land as that in which the trench had to be cut, and not far from the trench. The position is shown on the plan, exhibit P.2, and I make the pylon to be some fifty yards from where the cable was eventually struck. At this pylon the electric cable, which hitherto has come overhead from Cwm Colliery, goes down the pylon into the earth. Some distance away, in the direction of the Albion Colliery, which is the destination of the electric current, there is another pylon. From exhibit P.2 I make this second pylon some four hundred yards distant from the first. It is between these two pylons that the cable runs underground, to emerge at the second pylon, and continue overhead to the Albion Colliery. It is said on behalf of the plaintiffs to each of the first and second defendants: 'You should have inspected the first pylon, which is on the same land as that in which you had to cut the trench. Then you would have seen that the cable there went into the ground. Next, you should have seen the second pylon, some hundreds of yards away, with a cable emerging from the ground. Thus you should have known or suspected that somewhere between those two pylons the cable ran underground. And, although the cable would be nowhere near the line of the intended trench if the cable ran in a straight line between the two pylons, nevertheless you should have further suspected that it might, as it does in fact, pursue an erratic course between the pylons, and that that erratic course might bring it, as in fact it did, across the line of the intended trench; and, until these suspicions were confirmed or removed, it was your duty to dig trial holes by hand along the line of the proposed trench'."

That was the learned judge's summary of the allegations of negligence and on that he expressed his conclusions as follows:

"In my opinion, that is putting far too big a burden on the first defendants, who, having received plans from their principals, the Glamorgan County Council, showing no electric cables in the line of the intended trench, assumed that the plan was right, this being the normal practice of contractors. After all, the Glamorgan County Council owned the land, and should surely be in a position to know what cables ran through their land."

- A That is a clear finding of fact, and, even though it is true that here the question is largely what is the proper inference to be drawn from known facts, such as the position of the pylons, none the less I think that this court should be hesitant in interfering with this finding of fact by the trial judge. Even had I come to the conclusion that I might possibly have drawn a different inference, I should hesitate to interfere with his finding, but in this particular case I would respectfully express my agreement with the conclusion which the learned judge has reached and I would add that, if it can be right to say that the defendants should have suspected that the cable might pursue an erratic line, I think that they would primarily have expected to find it laid under highways, as cables so often are, rather than under the land on which they were going to work. I agree, therefore, entirely with the learned judge's finding on the question of negligence
- C as pleaded in para. 4 of the statement of claim.

I turn to the question of trespass. On this matter the learned judge found for the plaintiffs. He states that "... the answer made by the first defendants is that any such trespass was involuntary and accidental, and, therefore, not actionable."

- D He then says that the first defendants contend that the damage was too remote. With that I do not think that I shall have to deal. The learned judge went on to say: "They simply instructed the second defendants to dig the trench, without specifying" what should be done. He then deals with the important point in the defence, viz., that the trespass was involuntary and accidental, and he comes to the conclusion that this was merely another way of pleading inevitable accident, and on the facts of the case he held that there was no inevitable accident. He states his reasons as follows:

"It was intended to cut a trench by a mechanical excavator, and to cut it where it was in fact cut, and, though it was not intended to damage the cable, that result ensued, not through some act over which the first defendants lacked all control, but simply because they did not appreciate that what they were designedly and deliberately ordering would bring the excavator in contact with an electric cable. But this absence of information affords them, in my opinion, no defence against the allegation of trespass."

F

Later in his judgment he finds that the cable had been put, without permission, on land not proved to be the plaintiffs'.

- G As I understand the learned judge's judgment, he held that, if the act of interference with the plaintiffs or their property was an act which the defendants intended to perform, it was wholly immaterial whether the act was lawful and whether the defendants knew or were justifiably ignorant of the fact that the act might injure the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs' own unlawful conduct having prevented the defendants being aware of the fact that their act might injure the plaintiffs or their property. The learned judge felt himself constrained by
- H authority to hold that, even though the plaintiffs in the present case must be taken, on the evidence before the court, to have buried the cable under the land of the Glamorgan County Council without the knowledge of the council, the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs for the damage which the second defendants' excavator had caused.

Counsel for the defendants took us through a number of authorities and any gaps which he left were filled in by counsel for the plaintiffs. They started with Weaver v. Ward (1), in which (Hob. 134):

"Weaver brought an action of trespass of assault and battery against Ward. The defendant pleaded, that he was amongst others by the commandment of the Lords of the Council a trained soldier in London, of the band of one Andrews captain; and so was the plaintiff, and that they were skirmishing with their musquets charged with powder for their exercise in re militari, against another captain and his band; and as they were so skirmishing, the defendant casualiter and per infortunium and contra voluntatem suam, in discharging of his piece did hurt and wound the plaintiff, which is the same, etc. absque hoc, that he was guilty aliter sive alio modo. And upon demurrer by the plaintiff, judgment was given for him; for though it were agreed, that if men tilt or turney in the presence of the king, or if two masters of defence playing their prizes kill one another, that this shall be no felony; or if a lunatic kill a man, or the like, because felony must be done animo felonico: yet in trespass, which tends only to give damages according to hurt or loss, it is not so; and therefore if a lunatic hurt a man, he shall be answerable in trespass: and therefore no man shall be excused of a trespass (for this is the nature of an excuse, and not of a justification, prout ei bene licuit) except it may be judged utterly without his fault."

It is to be observed that, even in that case, which was relied on by the plaintiffs, it was held that, where the defendant was entirely without fault, he would have a good defence to an action in trespass.

Some of the earlier authorities, most of which appear to have been decided on points of procedure, contain dicta which support the learned judge's conclusion. It will, I think, be sufficient if I refer to the observations of GROSE, J., in Leame v. Bray (2), where he said (3 East 600):

"Looking into all the cases from the Year Book in the [twenty-first year of Henry VII], down to the latest decision on the subject, I find the principle to be, that if the injury be done by the act of the party himself at the time, or he be the immediate cause of it, though it happen accidentally or by misfortune, yet he is answerable in trespass."

That, it is said, is applicable in this case. Since the defendants intended to use their excavator and to excavate whatever was found in the earth, therefore (it is said) they are liable in trespass. Speaking for myself, I cannot imagine a clearer instance of an accident which occurred utterly without fault on the part of the defendants. The cable was not visible, and there was nothing on the plan of the Glamorgan County Council to indicate its presence. It had been placed there without the knowledge of the county council and without any permission from them. In those circumstances, I can see no ground for attaching any blame to the defendants. The damage seems to have been caused by the action of the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs themselves, who, the judge has found, placed their cable on the land in question without any legal right to do so and, so far as we know, without taking any steps to inform the county council or anyone else of the presence of the cable on the land.

I would add that the dicta in the earlier cases do not, if read literally, appear to have been approved or followed in any modern case. On the contrary, in Holmes v. Mather (3), where an accident had occurred on the highway, the defendant's horses having run away and the plaintiff having been injured by them, BRAMWELL, B., said (L.R. 10 Exch. 267):

"For the convenience of mankind in carrying on the affairs of life, people as they go along roads must expect, or put up with, such mischief as reasonable care on the part of others cannot avoid. I think the present action not to be maintainable."

After stating the principle on which most of the discussion in this case turned, BRAMWELL, B., said (ibid., 268):

"As to the cases cited, most of them are really decisions on the form of action, whether case or trespass. The result of them is this, and it is intelligible enough: if the act that does an injury is an act of direct force vi et armis, trespass is the proper remedy (if there is any remedy) where the act is wrongful, either as being wilful or as being the result of negligence. Where the act is not wrongful for either of these reasons, no action is maintainable, though trespass would be the proper form of action if it were wrongful."

- A Counsel for the plaintiffs said that those observations, though apparently general, were really directed to the facts of the case before the court, which was a case of an accident on a highway. He called our attention to various statements in text-books which indicated that the law applicable to accidents on a highway might be distinguishable from accidents which occurred on private property, because it could hardly be said that in the case of an accident on private property
- B the arguments based on the convenience of mankind, which BRAMWELL, B., put in the forefront of his judgment, were relevant.

- I see no logical reason for placing such a limit on the general observations of BRAMWELL, B., but it is not necessary to express a final conclusion on this point. The accident in the present case was attributable mainly to the conduct of the plaintiffs in placing their cable on the land of the Glamorgan County Council,
- C without the knowledge of the county council and without any notification to them, and in these circumstances it would, I think, be not merely inequitable, but contrary to common law principles, as laid down in Weaver v. Ward (1), that the plaintiffs should be allowed to succeed. Clearly, I should have thought that they could not have succeeded in an action against the county council, since they were trespassers in placing their cable on the land, and I cannot see
- D any reason why the defendants should be in a worse position than the county council.

- The only other case to which I need refer is Stanley v. Powell (4), which was tried before DENMAN, J., who cited with approval ([1891] 1 Q.B. 93) the observations of BRAMWELL, B., in Holmes v. Mather (3). Neither Holmes v. Mather (3) nor Stanley v. Powell (4) is binding on this court, but, if I may say so with
- E respect, I see no reason to differ from the conclusions arrived at in those cases. I would add that Stanley v. Powell (4) was not a case of an accident on the highway. It was a case where the defendant had fired at a pheasant and injured the plaintiff, who was engaged as a carrier of game for the party. It would be strange that DENMAN, J., should have cited the authority of BRAMWELL, B., in Holmes v. Mather (3) if he had thought that those observations were confined
- F to the case of accidents on the highway. For these reasons, I think that the defendants are entitled to succeed and that the action should have been dismissed.

- SINGLETON, L.J.: On the facts it is clear that the first party at fault was the plaintiffs. They or their predecessors had a cable in someone else's land. The trespassers in the first instance were, therefore, the owners of the cable.
- G The county council, I assume, were entitled to tell them at any time to remove it, and that, I suppose, might have led to negotiations, but it is a surprising thing to find, in these days, that an electric cable serving a colliery undertaking was put through land of the county council and the council had no knowledge of it. When the excavator belonging to the second defendants damaged the concrete above the cable, the first defendants knew of the damage and informed the
- H clerk of works of the county council, who went to see it. No report, however, went from the Glamorgan County Council to the plaintiffs, and, in that sense, the council are at fault.

What is the position of the defendants in this action? Neither of them knew that the cable was there. They had every reason to assume that there was no obstruction other than anything shown on their plan, and this cable was not shown on the plan. Therefore, up to this stage one has both defendants without fault, each of them following the course which an ordinary contractor in such circumstances would follow. The action was commenced against both defendants, alleging negligence against them and alleging that they were guilty of trespass. I have appreciated to the full the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs that the learned judge ought to have found that there was negligence, in that some fifty yards away there were pylons and, therefore, it might have been anticipated that there would be a cable under the land, but, having regard to the learned judge's finding, I do not think that there is any substance in that point. The plan was given to the contractors for a purpose and, when they were dealing with a responsible body like the Glamorgan County Council, they were entitled to rely on the plan. I agree with the learned judge's finding on that. I thought at one time that the plaintiffs might make a case on that which was called the second head of negligence, i.e., that, after the accident had occurred, the defendants ought to have reported the damage, but I am inclined to think that the man who was using the excavator which did the damage performed his duty in reporting to the county council. If there was something in the county council's land which was damaged, the contractor working for them did his duty in reporting to them and leaving it to them to do what was necessary. He did not know whose the cable was. However, I express no final opinion on that, for the point has not been argued. The question was raised in the court below as to whether that kind of negligence was covered by the pleading in this case, and it seems to have been accepted that it was not so covered. It is, therefore, not open to counsel for the plaintiffs to seek to argue it in this court. I would, however, like to repeat what COHEN, L.J., has said on this point. I regard it as of the greatest importance that, when any contractor strikes a cable, it is his duty to let it be known in some way, so that information will reach the owners of the cable, who in turn may be able to avoid much damage or possibly to avoid a serious accident.

The argument before this court has been almost wholly on trespass. I do not propose to go through the authorities which have been cited to the court, but shall refer only to two of them, Holmes v. Mather (3) and Stanley v. Powell (4). I draw attention to Holmes v. Mather (3), in part because of its history. It was a decision of the Court of Exchequer, in a case of an accident on the highway, horses having run away and caused injury. The claim was heard originally at Durham Assizes before FIELD, J., and a jury. Verdict was entered for the defendant, leave being reserved to the plaintiffs to move to enter it for them for £50 on the second count (a trespass count), the court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact and to make any amendment in the pleadings necessary to enable the defendant to raise any defence that ought to be raised. The case then came before the Court of Exchequer, consisting of BRAMWELL, B., CLEASBY, B., and POLLOCK, B., and it was argued for the plaintiffs by Mr. Herschell and for the defendant by Mr. Charles Russell. Two passages from the judgment of BRAMWELL, B., have been read by COHEN, L.J., and I do not repeat them. CLEASBY, B., who agreed with the judgment of BRAMWELL, B., added another reason for his decision, and POLLOCK, B., also agreed.

In Stanley v. Powell (4), a considered judgment of DENMAN, J., the learned judge, after referring to some of the earlier authorities, said ([1891] 1 Q.B. 89):

"The next case in order of date relied upon for the plaintiff was Weaver v. Ward (1), decided in 1607. There is no doubt that that case contains dicta which per se would be in favour of the plaintiff, but it also contains the following summing up of the law applicable to cases of unintentional injury by acts which are prima facie trespasses: 'Therefore, no man shall be excused of a trespass . . . except it may be judged utterly without his fault'."

After dealing admirably with all the old authorities, the learned judge said (ibid., 92):

"All the cases to which I have referred were before the Court of Exchequer in 1875, in the case of Holmes v. Mather (3), and BRAMWELL, B., in giving judgment in that case, dealt with them thus: 'As to the cases cited, most of them are really decisions on the form of action, whether case or trespass. The result of them is this, and it is intelligible enough: if the act that does an injury is an act of direct force vi et armis, trespass is the proper remedy (if there is any remedy), where the act is wrongful either as being wilful or as being the result of negligence. Where the act is not wrongful for either of these reasons, no action is maintainable, though trespass would be the proper form of action if it were wrongful. That is the effect of the decisions'."

The cable was in land of the Glamorgan County Council. The county council employed the defendants to make a trench. They gave them a plan. The cable was not shown on that plan. The county council did not know of the cable. There is no evidence whatever to show that the plaintiffs or their predecessors had any licence or permission to put that cable in the place in which it was put. As I have said, prima facie the cable is there wrongfully. If someone puts his car in my garage, I am entitled to move it. If I do so, I do not commit a trespass, nor does anyone whom I employ to move it. I am entitled to dig a hole on my land. If someone, without permission or without my knowledge, has put something on my land and I accidentally remove it, that is not trespass. He had no right to put it there. The defendants, in my view, are utterly without fault. That cannot be said of the plaintiffs, nor can it be said of the Glamorgan County Council. Following the views of the judges of days gone by, to whose opinions I have referred, I think that in these circumstances this court ought to hold that, where the plaintiffs are at fault and the defendants are free from fault, in that they have only done that which they were asked by the owner of the land to do, there is in fact no trespass by them. The plaintiffs' claim fails for the simple reason, as I think, that the facts proved do not disclose trespass on the part of either of the defendants. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. Weaver v. Ward (1), to which COHEN, L.J., and SINGLETON, L.J., have referred, was decided in 1607 and has been much referred to in the later authorities. The words cited by my Lords, "therefore no man shall be excused of a trespass . . . except it may be judged utterly without his fault," are words which show, as DENMAN, J., said ([1891] 1 Q.B. 89) in Stanley v. Powell (4), that there clearly may be such cases. Illustrations of the types of such cases were given in the concluding words of the report in Weaver v. Ward (1). The words are (Hob. 134):

"As if a man by force take my hand and strike you, or if here the defendant had said, that the plaintiff ran cross his piece when it was discharging, or had set forth the case with the circumstances, so as it had appeared to the court that it had been inevitable, and that the defendant had committed no negligence to give occasion to the hurt."

The first of those illustrations would be a case in which the act was not in reality the act of the defendant at all. The second illustration given is that "the plaintiff ran cross his piece when it was discharging." That illustration may, perhaps, be comparable with the facts of this case. In my judgment, the position of the defendants in this action must be judged on the same footing as the conduct of the Glamorgan County Council would have been judged if the county council had themselves done the work on their own land, instead of employing others to do it. If someone is lawfully digging on his own land and someone else comes and interposes an article between the spade as it is descending and the ground, so that the article is damaged, and damaged without any intention on the part of the person digging, it could not, in my judgment, be said that the latter was guilty of a trespass. It would be a case within the illustration given in Weaver v. Ward (1). The position, in my judgment, would be no different if someone, without the permission or knowledge of the owner of the land, buried an article under the soil in a place where the owner would be perfectly entitled to dig. If he did so dig and unintentionally damaged the thing which had been buried without his knowledge or permission, it could not, in my judgment, be said that the occurrence was the fault of the owner of the land rather than the fault of the owner of the thing. In my opinion, those are the facts of the present case which affords an illustration of what was referred to as an act that might be "judged utterly without his fault." There was, in my judgment, no fault in either of the defendants. I agree with all the reasons given by COHEN, L.J., and SINGLETON, L.J., and, in my view, this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

DAVIS v. MINISTER OF PENSIONS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), April 6, 1951.]

War Pension—War service injury—Injury arising out of and in course of performance of duties—War reserve constable—Injury while proceeding to place of duty—Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939 (c. 82), s. 8 (1). Police—Position of constable while off duty.

On Apr. 21, 1943, the claimant, who was a war reserve constable, was riding his bicycle from his home to his place of duty when he was struck by an overhanging twig of a tree as the result of which he lost the sight of one eye. He claimed to have suffered a war service injury within the meaning of s. 8 (1) of the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939, and so to be entitled to a pension.

HELD: the injury suffered by the claimant did not arise in the course of the performance by him of his duties within s. 8 (1), and, therefore, he was not entitled to a pension.

Per curiam: When the prescribed hours of duty of a police constable have come to an end and an emergency arises, it is his duty to attend to that emergency, and at that moment he is on duty in the strict and narrow sense which would bring him within the meaning of s. 8 (1), but until such an emergency arises, he is in the position of any other civilian.

FOR THE PERSONAL INJURIES (EMERGENCY PROVISIONS) ACT, 1939, s. 8 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 17, p. 895.

APPEAL by the claimant from a decision of a pensions appeal tribunal whereby it was held that an injury suffered by the claimant, a war reserve constable, while travelling to his place of duty was not a war service injury within the meaning of the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939, s. 8 (1).

Crispin for the claimant.

J.P. Ashworth for the Minister of Pensions.

ORMEROD, J.: The claimant, Albert Davis, appeals by leave of the tribunal against the decision of a pensions appeal tribunal of July 20, 1950, when it was held that an accident which occurred to him on Apr. 21, 1943, was not a war service injury within the meaning of s. 8 (1) of the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939. The claimant was a war reserve constable and on the day in question it was his duty to present himself at the police station at 5.45 a.m. To do that he was cycling from his home to the police station, and at about 5.40 a.m., he was struck by the overhanging twig of a tree, with the result that he lost the sight of one eye. He now claims that that injury should be regarded as a war service injury within the terms of s. 8 (1).

Section 8 (1) provides:

A “ ‘ war service injury ’ in relation to a civil defence volunteer, means any physical injury which the Minister certifies to have been shown to his satisfaction to have arisen out of and in the course of the performance by the volunteer of his duties as a member of the civil defence organisation to which he belonged at the time when the injury was sustained . . . ”

B There is no question here that the claimant was a member of a civil defence organisation within the meaning of this section, and the only question is whether the injury that he sustained when he was cycling to his duty on this occasion was a war service injury in that it arose out of and in the course of the performance by the claimant of his duties as a member of the particular civil defence organisation to which he belonged.

C The wording in the Act of 1939 follows closely the wording of s. 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The difference is that in the Act of 1925 an accident is referred to as one which arises out of and in the course of the employment of the workman, whereas the Act of 1939 refers to an injury which has arisen “ out of and in the course of the performance by the volunteer of his duties.” It has been held in a large number of cases under the Workmen's Compensation Acts that an accident which occurs to a workman on the way to his work is not an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment unless for some reason it is a part of the workman's duty to travel to his work in the particular way in which he was travelling at the time he was injured.

D In the present case it is unquestioned that the claimant was proceeding to his duty by a method of his own choosing. In these circumstances, on the face of it, he was not doing something which he was bound to do because of the terms of his employment. It is said, however, that there must be a distinction in this case because a constable is still on duty at any time although it is outside his hours of duty, and, therefore, any accident which happens to him must be an accident arising out of and in the course of the performance of his duties. I cannot accept that view. When the prescribed hours of duty of a constable have come to an end and an emergency arises it is his duty to attend to that emergency, and at that moment he is on duty in the strict and narrow sense which would bring him within the meaning of s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1939, but until such an emergency arises he is in the position of any other civilian. In the present case, F therefore, I am of opinion that this accident could not be said to have arisen in the course of the performance of any duty which the claimant had to perform as a member of the civil defence organisation, and I find it impossible to say that the tribunal have erred in law in coming to the decision to which they have.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

MURRAY AND ANOTHER v. HARRINGAY ARENA, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Singleton and Morris, L.J.J.), June 5, 6, 7, 15, 1951.]

Negligence—Child—Sport—Ice-hockey—Child spectator injured by puck—Implied contract—Reasonable care for safety—Foreseeable danger incident to entertainment.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of ORMEROD, J., dated Dec. 20, 1950, whereby he gave judgment for the defendants in a claim for damages for personal injuries.

On Nov. 20, 1948, David Charles Murray, who was then six years old, was taken by his parents to the defendants' ice rink to watch a hockey match. They occupied front seats on one side of the rink, and during the game the boy was hit in the eye by the puck. The boy, through his father as next friend, and the father, on his own behalf, brought an action against the defendants as occupiers of the rink and promoters for reward of ice-hockey matches, alleging negligence and breach of an implied term in the contract that the arena was as safe as care and skill could make it. Around the rink was a wooden barrier three feet, eight inches, high, and there was no protection above this barrier for spectators at the sides of the rink. Behind each goal there was a netting five or six feet above the barrier. There was evidence that from time to time the puck went over the barrier at the side, but that it was not the practice to provide protection there because of the interference with the view of the spectators. There was no evidence to show that a serious accident to a spectator had ever occurred before. ORMEROD, J., found that the risk of the puck going over the side was not an unusual danger and that the principle in Indermaur v. Dames (1) did not apply. He further found that there was no negligence by the defendants nor a breach of an implied term in the contract, that there was no failure to take ordinary precautions, and that the plaintiffs voluntarily undertook the risk of accident.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 15. SINGLETON, L.J., read a judgment in which he said: I regard it as clear from the authorities that the implied term is not that the occupiers shall guard against every known risk. There are some dangers which every reasonable spectator foresees and of which he takes the risk. It may strike one as a little hard that this should apply in the case of a six years old boy, but, in considering liability under an implied term in this contract, it would not be right to introduce a wider term because one of the parties is a youth. The implied term is to take reasonable care. In measuring that one must have regard to the reasonable man (or spectator), and the duty arising under it does not involve an obligation to protect against a danger incident to the entertainment which any reasonable spectator foresees and of which he takes the risk: see dictum of SCRUTTON, L.J., ([1933] 1 K.B. 214) in Hall v. Brooklands Auto-Racing Club (2) and the footnote in Stanley v. Powell (3) ([1891] 1 Q.B. 86). I am in favour of dismissing the appeal on two grounds: (i) It was not proved to the satisfaction of the trial judge that the defendants were negligent or that they failed to do anything which they were under any obligation to do, and there is nothing which would justify this court in interfering with that finding. (ii) The injury sustained by the boy resulted from a danger incident to the game of which spectators took the risk.

COHEN and MORRIS, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Re LOVE. Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER (TRUSTEE)
v. KINGSTON-UPON-THAMES COUNTY COURT REGISTRAR.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), June 11, 18, 1951.]

Bankruptcy—Execution—Relation back of trustee's title—Execution completed before date of receiving order, and before notice of presentation of bankruptcy petition or of act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 37 (1), s. 40 (1).

On Sept. 8, 1949, the bankrupt committed an act of bankruptcy by failing to comply with the requirements of a bankruptcy notice. On Oct. 4, a county court ordered the bankrupt to pay a sum of £10 as fines imposed on him for contempt of court. On Nov. 4, the registrar of the county court, as high bailiff, seized the bankrupt's household furniture, pursuant to warrants of execution dated Oct. 17. On Nov. 11, 1949, a bankruptcy petition was presented against the bankrupt in the High Court. On Nov. 15 the registrar sold the furniture for £101 15s. out of which he retained the amount of the fines of £10, under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 170, no notice of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition or of an act of bankruptcy having then been received by him. On Dec. 14 a receiving order was made against the bankrupt, and on Jan. 5, 1950, he was adjudged bankrupt. The official receiver, as trustee of the property of the bankrupt, now claimed the repayment of the sum of £10 from the registrar on the ground that, as, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 37 (1), his title related back to Sept. 8, 1949, when the act of bankruptcy was committed, the goods seized were vested in him and not in the bankrupt at the date of the seizure.

HELD: a creditor who had received payment by virtue of an execution duly completed within the meaning of s. 40 (1) and s. 40 (2) of the Act of 1914, was entitled to rely on the provisions of that section, which was not a wholly restrictive one, and, if he had completed the execution by seizure and sale before notice of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition or of an act of bankruptcy, he was entitled to retain the money which he had received and was not affected by the provisions of s. 37 and s. 38 of the Act, and, therefore, the official receiver was not entitled to demand payment of the £10 received by the registrar.

MOTION for (a) a declaration that on Nov. 4, 1949, the date of an execution levied by the registrar of Kingston-upon-Thames County Court, the goods on which execution was levied were vested in the official receiver as trustee of the property of the bankrupt, and (b) payment of the sum of £10 retained by the registrar from the sale of the goods as the amount of fines imposed on the bankrupt by the county court, on Oct. 4, 1949, for contempt of court. It was contended by the official receiver that, as his title as trustee related back to an act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt on Sept. 8, 1949, the goods seized were vested in him and not in the bankrupt at the date of seizure. The facts appear in the judgment.

Muir Hunter for the official receiver.

Denys B. Buckley for the registrar.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 18. DANCKWERTS, J., read the following judgment. This is an application by the official receiver, as the trustee of the property of the bankrupt, John William Love. The circumstances in which it is made are as follows. On Sept. 8, 1949, an act of bankruptcy was committed by failing to comply with a bankruptcy notice. A petition was presented on Nov. 11, 1949. A receiving order was made on Dec. 14, 1949, and on Jan. 5, 1950, the bankrupt was adjudged a bankrupt. All this took place in the High Court. On Oct. 10, 1949, judgment was entered in the Kingston-upon-Thames County Court in favour of the Minister of National Insurance against the bankrupt for the sum of £60 7s. 3d., representing arrears of contributions due from the bankrupt under the relevant Acts, and at the same time a warrant of execution was granted to the Minister, the costs of such execution being £1 6s., making a total sum of £61 13s. 3d. Earlier, on Oct. 4, 1949, the bankrupt had been ordered to pay a sum of £10, being the amount of fines imposed on him by the county court for contempt of court. The registrar of the Kingston-upon-Thames County Court is also the high bailiff, and so the officer in charge of execution. Pursuant to warrants of execution, dated Oct. 17, 1949, the registrar, on Nov. 4, 1949, seized the bankrupt's household furniture, and on Nov. 15, 1949, he sold the furniture for £101 15s. Out of this sum the amount of the judgment debt was paid to the judgment creditor and the amount of the fines of £10 was retained by the registrar by virtue of the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 170. When the official receiver demanded repayment from the Minister of the sum of £61 13s. 3d. received by him the Minister repaid the amount. The registrar, however, has refused to repay the sum of £10.

A In these circumstances the official receiver claims a declaration that at the date of the execution on Nov. 4, 1949, the goods and chattels seized were vested in him as the trustee of the property of the bankrupt, and payment of the said sum of £10. The claim of the official receiver is based on the proposition that by virtue of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 37 and s. 38; and the relation back of the trustee's title to the act of bankruptcy committed on Sept. 8, 1949, on which the receiving order was made on Dec. 14, 1949, the goods and chattels which were seized were the property of the trustee and not of the bankrupt at the date of the seizure. It will be observed that the date of the seizure (Nov. 4, 1949, under
B warrants dated Oct. 17, 1949) was after the date of the act of bankruptcy, but the execution was completed by seizure and sale before the date of the receiving order (Dec. 14, 1949). Assuming that the fines amounting to £10 represent debts which were due to the Crown, a question which might arise on the present application would be whether, in any case, the provisions of s. 37 and s. 38 are effective against the Crown. However, counsel for the registrar, while wishing to keep
C the point open in case of an appeal, was not prepared to press it before me, in view of the decision in Re Thomas. Ex p. Woods & Forests Comrs. (1). Counsel for the official receiver would have been prepared to argue that the matter is concluded in the Court of Appeal by Re Webb (H. J.) & Co. (Smithfield, London), Ltd. (2) (which is, of course, a company case), and he relied also on the provisions of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 26 (1). In view of the attitude
D of counsel for the registrar, I need not consider this question.

The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 26 (1) settles the time when the goods of a judgment debtor are bound by a writ of execution, viz., "... as from the time when the writ is delivered to the sheriff to be executed." By s. 26 (2):

"... the term 'sheriff' includes any officer charged with the enforcement of a writ of execution."

E In the present case the registrar, as the high bailiff, is the officer so charged, and the material date appears to be Oct. 17, 1949. The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 40, is the first in a group of sections bearing the title "Effect of bankruptcy on antecedent and other transactions." The provisions of this section are as follows:

F "(1) Where a creditor has issued execution against the goods or lands of a debtor, or has attached any debt due to him, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution or attachment against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor, unless he has completed the execution or attachment before the date of the receiving order, and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition by or against the debtor, or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor. (2) For the
G purposes of this Act, an execution against goods is completed by seizure and sale; an attachment of a debt is completed by receipt of the debt; and an execution against land is completed by seizure, or, in the case of an equitable interest, by the appointment of a receiver. (3) An execution levied by seizure and sale on the goods of a debtor is not invalid by reason only of its being an act of bankruptcy, and a person who purchases the goods
H in good faith under a sale by the sheriff shall, in all cases, acquire a good title to them against the trustee in bankruptcy."

No question of notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy arises in the present case. On the actual facts of the present case the terms of s. 40 are completely fulfilled. The execution against the goods of the debtor was completed by seizure and sale of the goods on Nov. 15, 1949, before the date of the receiving order, which was made on Dec. 14, 1949. Moreover, it has been held by the Court of Appeal in Re Andrew. Ex p. Official Receiver (Trustee) (No. 2) (3), approving Re Godwin. Ex p. Trustee v. Morris. Re Godwin. Ex p. Trustee v. British Reinforced Concrete Engineering Co. (4) and Re Samuels. Ex p. Trustee v. Tee (5), that the words "the benefit of the execution" in s. 40 (1) do not refer to moneys actually received by the judgment creditor in whole or partial satisfaction of his debt, but refer to the charge which a judgment creditor obtains by the issue of the execution, so that to the extent that a judgment creditor has received payment of his debt (whether in part or in whole) there is nothing which can be disturbed by the provisions of s. 40. In Re Andrew (3), however, the payments which the judgment creditor received were made before May 28, 1935, when the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy (of which it would appear that the judgment creditor had notice), and the possible effect of the relation back of the trustee's title was not considered by the Court of Appeal.

There is no doubt that, in actual fact, at the dates of seizure and sale in the course of the execution in the present case the goods were the property of the debtor, but counsel for the official receiver contended that by reason of the provisions of s. 37 the goods must be treated in law as having been at that date the property of the official receiver (as the trustee in bankruptcy), and so there was a wrongful seizure and sale (notwithstanding the terms of s. 40), and he further contended that this result is required by the policy of the Bankruptcy Acts which demands an equal division of the bankrupt's property among all his creditors (unless otherwise specifically provided) through the trustee, in accordance with the terms of s. 18 (1) of the Act, in the event of adjudication. This result is achieved by applying the provisions of s. 38 (1) and s. 37 (1) of the Act. Section 38 (1) provides that "the property of the bankrupt divisible amongst his creditors" shall not comprise certain things (which are immaterial for the purposes of the present case) but shall comprise

"(a) All such property as may belong to or be vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge . . ."

Section 37 (1) provides:

"The bankruptcy of a debtor . . . shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the act of bankruptcy being committed on which a receiving order is made against him, or, if the bankrupt is proved to have committed more acts of bankruptcy than one, to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the first of the acts of bankruptcy proved to have been committed by the bankrupt within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition . . ."

Certainly as long ago as the Act of 1571 (13 Eliz., c. 7) the principle of preventing one creditor achieving an advantage over another creditor of an insolvent trader appears in the bankruptcy legislation. Under the Act of 1571, in theory at any rate, a trader from the moment of committing an act of bankruptcy was deprived of the power of free disposition of his property to the prejudice of his creditors. Later Acts have tended to limit the period during which a bankruptcy might upset prior events, and the relation back for a period of twelve months provided for in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 11, seems to have been inconveniently long. It was also found necessary to introduce certain protective provisions to save genuine transactions in the ordinary course of business, of which s. 45 of the Act of 1914 is an example. One of the matters which has been canvassed is whether s. 40 of the Act of 1914 is such a protective section or is merely "restrictive," whatever that may mean. The provisions of s. 40, s. 41 and s. 45 of the Act of 1914 correspond to s. 45, s. 46 and s. 49, respectively, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Exactly similar provisions were not contained in the Act of 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 16) or the Act of 1869, but s. 95 of the Act of 1869 provided that certain "transactions," including executions “ . . . executed in good faith by seizure and sale before the date of the order of adjudication . . . ”

A and without notice of an act of bankruptcy should “ be valid, notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy.” This has been described as a “ protective provision ” [the side-note to the section being “ Protection of certain transactions entered into by or in relation to the property of the bankrupt ”], and, a similar provision having been omitted from the Act of 1883, it has been suggested that the provisions of the Act of 1883 corresponding to s. 40 of the Act of 1914 indicate a change of policy.

B My attention was called to certain decisions in regard to the provisions of the earlier Acts. In Re O'Shea's Settlement (6) the Court of Appeal decided that a charging order under the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 14, on stock or shares or money in court belonging to a judgment debtor was not a “ transaction ” protected by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 49 (which corresponds to s. 45 of the Act of 1914). The court seem to have thought that an execution could not be a “ transaction ” for the purposes of the section, but it appears to have been overlooked that in s. 95 of the Act of 1869 the legislature treated an execution as being within the term “ transaction by and in relation to the property of a bankrupt.” Section 45 of the Act of 1883 (which corresponds to s. 40 of the Act of 1914) was not relied on in that case. In Wild v. Southwood (7) VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., applied the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re O'Shea's Settlement (6) to the case of a charging order under the Partnership Act, 1890, s. 23. So far as these two cases depend on the meaning of “ transaction ” in s. 49 of the Act of 1883, they do not assist very much in regard to the provisions of s. 40 of the Act of 1914. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., however, also expressed his views in regard to s. 45 of the Act of 1883 (corresponding to s. 40 of the Act of 1914) which he described as “ a restrictive section,” as compared with s. 49 of the Act of 1883 (s. 45 of the Act of 1914), which he referred to as “ the protective section.” In the course of his judgment, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., said ([1897] 1 Q.B. 319):

E “ What is the right of the execution creditor? His right is to seize the goods or property of the bankrupt, and to levy execution thereon. He has no right to seize or levy execution on the property of anyone else. Now, at the date when the first step towards getting execution, or anything in the nature of execution, was taken, was the interest of the bankrupt in the partnership property his property or not? If it was his property, the execution creditor had a right to go against it; if it was not, the creditor had no such right. The first step towards obtaining the charging order was the taking out of the summons on Apr. 20, 1896, and at that time the bankrupt's interest in the partnership had ceased to be his interest. It had vested in the official receiver, and became the property of the trustee in bankruptcy in the events which happened. This law of relation back, which makes the title of the trustee vest as from a date antecedent to the transaction or event which took place without any petition in bankruptcy having occurred or a receiving order having been made, operates no doubt very hardly in many cases, and therefore various Acts of Parliament have contained protective sections to relieve those persons who would be injured by the stringency of that law. Apart from those protective sections, it is plain that this execution cannot hold good against the trustee in bankruptcy whose title relates back to a period anterior to it.”

I The learned judge then considered whether the charging order came within the protective provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 49 (corresponding to s. 45 of the Act of 1914). I was referred to Re Pollard. Ex p. Pollard (8), but it seems to me that it was merely decided in that case that, on the facts relating to a writ of sequestration, there had been nothing equivalent to “ seizure and sale ” at the material date for the purposes of s. 45 of the Act of 1883 (corresponding to s. 40 of the Act of 1914). I do not find that case of assistance, therefore.

In substance, I think that the argument of counsel for the official receiver is based on the proposition put forward by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in Wild v. Southwood (7), that, by virtue of the rules as to the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors in bankruptcy relating back to "the commencement of the bankruptcy," the property seized in execution may turn out to have been the property of the trustee in bankruptcy and not of the bankrupt at the material date. It is true that, as pointed out by counsel for the registrar, this position depends on a fiction superimposed on the true facts by subsequent events, viz., the receiving order and the adjudication in bankruptcy, but if the provisions of the bankruptcy law require this operation, then it must be applied, notwithstanding the hardship which may thereby be caused. It is a position which is created by the artificial provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts. The process described by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in Wild v. Southwood (7) seems to me to be the result of the provisions now contained in s. 38 and s. 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. I have difficulty, however, in following the argument that s. 45 of the Act of 1883 was, and s. 40 of the Act of 1914 is, wholly restrictive and not at all protective. And why should the conclusion be drawn (as apparently it has been drawn) that the Act of 1883 was intended in this respect radically to alter the position as contained in s. 95 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which gathered together several provisions in a manner which was evidently intended to protect the transactions therein mentioned against the rigour of the bankruptcy law?

I do not reach this conclusion. I think that the Act of 1883 was not intended radically to alter the law but was a re-grouping of the relevant provisions. Similarly, in the Act of 1914, s. 40 is one of a group of sections bearing the description "Effect of bankruptcy on antecedent and other transactions". It will be observed, incidentally, that the word "transaction" is used in the Act of 1914 to describe the events to be mentioned in all these sections. The words "Restriction of rights of creditor under execution or attachment" are, it is true, to be found in a side-note to s. 40. Unless, however, s. 40 is intended to be a declaration of the position of a judgment creditor who has levied execution and not merely a restrictive provision, it seems to me that it is calculated to mislead judgment creditors in an unfortunate manner. The normal and reasonable inference, surely, is that, if the judgment creditor has completed the execution by seizure and sale without any notice of an act of bankruptcy, he is then safe from the risk of losing his money by reason of a subsequent bankruptcy on the part of the debtor. It appears to me most unfortunate if the result of the general provisions found earlier in the Act is to deprive a judgment creditor, whose case falls exactly within the terms of s. 40 in regard to a completed execution, of the money which he has duly received. I do not think that I am compelled to reach such a result. In my view, s. 40 is not wholly restrictive and a creditor who has received payment by virtue of an execution duly completed, as mentioned in s. 40 of the Act, is entitled to rely on the provisions of that section and is not affected by the general provisions of s. 37 and s. 38 of the Act. In my view, this gives a desirable coherency to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, in accordance with the description which precedes s. 40 to s. 47 of the Act. Accordingly, the official receiver is not entitled to demand payment of the sum of £10 received by the registrar, and the application fails.

Order accordingly.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., and Jenkins, L.J.), June 11, 1951.]

A *Court of Appeal—Appeal against order for compulsory winding-up of company—
To be entered in interlocutory appeals list.*

APPEAL by a company against an order for its compulsory winding-up made by VAISEY, J., on Apr. 16, 1951. The Court of Appeal constituted to hear the appeal had only two members, and the question arose whether it had jurisdiction.

C Winterbotham for the petitioning creditor.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., said that by R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 9, it was provided that in matters of this kind the time limit for the appeal should be the same as the time limit for an appeal from an interlocutory order under r. 15. Clearly the language of that rule proceeded on the assumption that an appeal from a winding-up order was an appeal from a final order, though it recognised the need for despatch. It would be difficult to think of any order made by the court which in substance or character was more final than a winding-up order. So far as the court was concerned, it was a final direction in the proceedings. When Re Naval, Military & Civil Service Co-operative Society of South Africa, Ltd. (1) was before the court in 1903 on an application for security for costs on an appeal from a winding-up order, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., who was presiding, observed that it would be convenient that appeals from compulsory winding-up orders should be treated as interlocutory, and not as final, appeals, but he (His Lordship) did not understand the learned lord justice to have expressed the view that for all purposes they should be treated as interlocutory appeals. He appeared to mean that for the purpose of bringing them before the Court of Appeal they should be dealt with as though they were, though they might well not in fact be, interlocutory appeals. It was most desirable that that should be so, and in order that effect might be given to that observation His Lordship (SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.) stated that appeals from orders on winding-up petitions should be entered in the interlocutory appeals list. He made that direction in order that they might come quickly before the court and not render necessary (as happened in this case) special applications to the court.

G The attention of the court has been drawn to a short note in the SOLICITORS' JOURNAL of Re Globe General Insurance Co. (2) before BOWEN, L.J., and FRY, L.J. The court then stated that, although the time for appealing was limited by Ord. 58, r. 9, the appeal was final and not interlocutory and must, therefore, be entered in the final list. But in the circumstances already mentioned, and having regard to the later view expressed by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., the direction which he

H (His Lordship) had already given should henceforth be adopted.

Re KLEINWORT'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. WESTMINSTER
BANK, LTD., AND OTHERS v. BENNETT AND OTHERS.

(CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), June 14, 15, 1951.)

Settlement—Capital or income—Tenant for life and remainderman—Apportionment—Capital profits dividend—Profit on sale of company's assets—Company to continue as investment and holding company.

Company—Capital profits dividend—Capital or income—Assets of company acquired by State—Profit on sale—Reconstruction of company as investment and holding company—Receipt of dividend by settlement trustees.

On Nov. 3, 1944, the trustees of a settlement, acting within their powers, invested £8,000 of the trust fund in £2,000 ordinary stock of Thomas Tilling, Ltd. On Mar. 17, 1949, Thomas Tilling, Ltd., passed a resolution for the distribution of £20,600,000 British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock as a special capital profits dividend on its ordinary stock, £5 of Transport stock being distributed to the holders of each £1 of the ordinary stock in Thomas Tilling, Ltd. Pursuant to that resolution, the trustees received £10,000 British Transport stock, and they now sought directions whether the said holding ought to be dealt with as capital or income of the trust fund.

Held: the £10,000 British Transport stock was income belonging to the tenants for life under the settlement, and, although there might well be jurisdiction in a court of equity to apportion the holding between capital and income in special circumstances, there were no circumstances in the present case to warrant the exercise of that jurisdiction.

Re Sechiari ([1950] 1 All E.R. 417), applied.

Seemle that the equitable jurisdiction to apportion an accretion of the nature of the £10,000 British Transport stock between capital and income may exist only where the trustees have been guilty of a breach of trust resulting in the accretion.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for directions to the trustees of a settlement whether they should distribute £10,000 three per cent. guaranteed British Transport stock received by them as holders of £2,000 stock of Thomas Tilling, Ltd., to the persons entitled to the income of the trust fund or whether they should retain any and if so what part of the said stock as capital.

Thomas Tilling, Ltd., had considerable interests in passenger road transport and road haulage undertakings. As a result of the Transport Act, 1947, these interests were sold by the company to the British Transport Commission for £24,800,000 which was satisfied by the allotment to the company of British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock at 101 per cent. At an extraordinary general meeting of the company its memorandum was altered so that the company became entirely an investment and holding company, and at the same meeting the company resolved to pay a special capital profits dividend, which resulted in the receipt by the trustees of the £10,000 three per cent. guaranteed British Transport stock above mentioned.

Jopling for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the settlement.

J. A. Brightman for the first to seventh defendants, the tenants for life.

W. F. Waite for the remaindermen and infant defendants.

VAISEY, J.: This is a summons in an action entitled in the matter of three settlements, and it concerns the second of those settlements, which is dated Jan. 12, 1927. The plaintiffs are the trustees of the settlement. There is a large number of defendants, of whom I need only say that some of them are interested in income as tenants for life under the trusts of the settlement, and others are interested in capital under those trusts in remainder. By an order of UTHWATT, J., made in this action on Dec. 4, 1942, a scheme was sanctioned whereby, among other things, the range of investments authorised by each of the three settlements was enlarged so as to include (among other things) the purchase of the ordinary stock of any company quoted or dealt with on the London Stock Exchange. In accordance with the trusts of the said settlement as varied by the said scheme, the trustees, on Nov. 3, 1944, invested £6,000, subject to the trusts of the said settlement, in the purchase of £2,000 ordinary stock of Thomas Tilling, Ltd., at the price of £3 for each £1 of such stock. On Mar. 17, 1949, Thomas Tilling, Ltd., passed a resolution for the distribution of £20,600,000 of British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock as a special capital profits dividend on its ordinary stock, £5 of such Transport stock being distributed to the holders of each £1 of the Tilling stock held by them. Pursuant to such resolution, the plaintiffs as trustees received £10,000 of Transport stock. The summons asks me to give directions whether the plaintiffs should distribute the £10,000 Transport stock to the persons entitled to the income of the trust fund, or whether they should retain any, and, if so, what part, of the Transport stock as capital.

On Feb. 7, 1950, in Re Sechiari (1), ROMER, J., declared, in circumstances indistinguishable from the present case, that another sum of this Transport stock received by trustees in respect of a sum of Tilling stock forming part of a settled fund was to be treated, not as an accretion to capital but as dividend or income, but the order was expressed to be made without prejudice to any question whether, in the circumstances of the execution of the trust, the court had, or would exercise, any jurisdiction to apportion the dividend on equitable principles between income and capital. If I am not actually bound by that decision I am in full agreement with it, and it is not, and cannot be, disputed that this sum of £10,000 Transport stock has to be treated as dividend or income belonging to the life tenants, and the only question for my decision is as to the suggested jurisdiction to apportion which was adverted to in the concluding words of the order of ROMER, J.

The life tenants here do not, I think, dispute that such a jurisdiction exists, or may exist, and that it could be exercised by the court in proper circumstances. It may be so, though I am not entirely satisfied that the jurisdiction does not depend on and arise out of the power and duty of the court to remedy a breach of trust. By way of example, and only by way of example, if the trustees had acquired the Tilling stock on the eve of, or within a short time before, the resolution of Mar. 17, 1949, at the instigation of a life tenant, or expressly with the object of benefiting a life tenant, or for some other ulterior motive, the court might well consider that an apportionment should be made, but that is not this case. It is, no doubt, a question of degree. The disparity between the amount of the original capital of the Tilling stock and the amount of the Transport stock is certainly very striking, but it is not, in my judgment, such as by itself to justify the court's interference, in the circumstances.

It was pointed out in argument that the trustees might have sold the Tilling stock cum rights, or might have sold the rights, in either of which cases the proceeds would have been capital, and it was suggested that they ought to have sought the directions of the court whether it was their duty to adopt one or other of those courses for the benefit of capital, or, on the other hand, to remain, as they did, passive, and accept the Transport stock for the benefit of income. It was further suggested that, if the directions of the court had been so sought, the trustees would have been ordered to arrange for half the Transport stock to go to capital and the other half to income, on the principle that equality is the best equity in the absence of any other measure. Finally, it was suggested that I ought to do now what I could have done then, and divide the Transport stock in equal shares between capital and income.

I am unable to accede to those suggestions in the present case. While it may well be that the suggested jurisdiction exists and while I do not doubt the power of the court to exercise it in suitable special circumstances—although, as I have said, it may be that interference by the court could only be justified where the trustees could be said to have committed some breach of trust consisting either of some action or inaction on their part—here, in my judgment, there are no special circumstances, and I cannot think that there is anything in the nature of a general rule that profits distributed, in whatever shape, as dividends, and belonging under well-settled principles to the tenant for life, must be subject to an apportionment for the benefit of capital. The cases which seem to me to govern the general principle applicable to this kind of income rights are Re Doughty (2), and Re Harrison's Will Trusts (3). These accretions to the normal income of the trust fund are sometimes metaphorically described as “windfalls,” and when they have left the parent tree I can see no principle for notionally replacing them on the boughs from which they have fallen. I direct the plaintiffs to deal with the Transport stock as part of the income of the trust funds of which the Tilling stock formed part.

Order accordingly.

PENTECOST AND ANOTHER v. LONDON DISTRICT AUDITOR AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Devlin, JJ.),
June 13, 14, 1951.]

Local Government—Audit—Surcharge—“Negligence”—Local Government Act, 1933 (c. 51), s. 228 (1) (d).

By the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 228 (1) “It shall be the duty of the district auditor at every audit held by him . . . (d) to surcharge the amount of any loss or deficiency upon any person by whose negligence or misconduct the loss or deficiency has been incurred . . .”

In refusing to surcharge a local authority or their officers in respect of certain payments made under building contracts which had been objected to by ratepayers, the district auditor stated as his reasons that, though isolated instances of defective work had escaped the notice of the council's technical supervising officers, “they do not appear . . . to have been of an extent or of such frequent occurrence as to warrant my finding that, but for gross negligence on the part of the council's supervising officers, they would have been brought to light. The objections, therefore, fail.”

HELD: “negligence” in s. 228 (1) (d) of the Local Government Act, 1933, meant, not “gross negligence,” but negligence at common law, i.e., a breach of duty causing loss; the district auditor was, therefore, wrong in holding that a finding of gross negligence was necessary before he could direct a surcharge; but, on the facts as found, there had been no negligence, and so the appeal against his decision must be dismissed.

APPEAL under s. 229 of the Local Government Act, 1933, against the decision of a district auditor refusing to surcharge for alleged negligence in connection with building contracts.

D

The appellants, two ratepayers of the metropolitan borough of Wandsworth, were employed as painters by the borough council, and, while engaged on the inside painting of houses on council housing estates, they observed the work on the outside painting which was being carried out by contractors under contracts of a total value of £13,000. Considering that some of this work was not being properly done, they drew up a list of complaints and referred them to their trade union, which, on Oct. 24, 1949, made representations to the council. On Mar. 29, 1950, the council appointed a special sub-committee to investigate the matter.

E

The sub-committee reported that the contracts had been completed substantially in accordance with their terms, but that the contractors should be called on to make good some defective work. The contractors made good the work, but on Jan. 3, 1951, the appellants, being still dissatisfied, appeared before the district auditor at the audit of the accounts for the year ending Mar. 31, 1950, and objected to items in the account on the ground that they were payments in respect of work either not done or improperly done by the contractors. They contended that, if the council had exercised proper supervision or if their technical employees, particularly the clerks of works, had not been guilty of lack of care, either the payments would not have been made or payments in respect of improper work would have been made by the contractors. After an adjournment to Jan. 11, 1951, when he heard evidence from officers of the council, the district auditor refused to surcharge the council or their officials responsible for passing the work and gave his reasons in writing in accordance with the requirements of s. 226 (2) of the Act of 1933. He found that, though there had been isolated instances of defective work which had escaped the notice of the council's technical supervising officers, they did not warrant a finding that they would have been brought to light but for gross negligence on the officers' part. The ratepayers now contended that the district auditor was wrong in law and applied the wrong test in arriving at his decision and conducted the audit without a proper regard for his duties.

Collard for the ratepayers.

Simes, K.C., and A. H. Bray for the district auditor.

M. Lyell for the borough council.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I will ask LYNSEY, J., to give the first judgment.

LYNSKEY, J., stated the facts and continued: It is urged, first of all, that in his decision the district auditor said that he was unable to surcharge unless he could find gross negligence on the part of either the council or on that of the officials concerned. It is true that he ends his decision by saying:

"After mature consideration of the evidence I have come to the conclusion that there have been isolated instances of defective work which have escaped the notice of the council's technical supervising officers, but they do not appear to me to have been of an extent or of such frequent occurrence as to warrant my finding that, but for gross negligence on the part of the council's supervising officers, they would have been brought to light. The objections, therefore, fail."

It is said on behalf of the present objectors that the district auditor applied the wrong test in that before he could surcharge the council or their officials he must find them guilty, not of gross negligence, but of negligence. The Local Government Act, 1933, sets out the duties of the district auditor in s. 228 (1), which provides, among other things:

"It shall be the duty of the district auditor at every audit held by him . . . (d) to surcharge the amount of any loss or deficiency upon any person by whose negligence or misconduct the loss or deficiency has been incurred . . ."

A similarly worded section in an Irish Act was considered by the King's Bench Division in Ireland in R. v. Browne (1) where LORD O'BRIEN, C.J., took the view that, as the word "negligence" was used with the word "misconduct," the negligence must be construed as being something in the nature of negligence involving moral culpability, or, to use another phrase which is sometimes used, crassa negligentia, or gross negligence. The matter came before a Divisional Court in this country in Davies v. Cowperthwaite (2), where BRANSON, J., referred to R. v. Browne (1), and quoted, apparently with approval, the observations of LORD O'BRIEN. He said ([1938] 2 All E.R. 689):

"It is true that, in the Irish case of R. v. Browne (1), LORD O'BRIEN, C.J. ([1907] 2 I.R. 518), drew attention to the fact, in dealing with s. 20 of the Act of 1902, which, so far as is material, is in the same language as is the section with which we have to deal, that the word 'negligence,' being associated in the section with the word 'misconduct', involves, he thinks, some element of moral culpability. With great respect, I agree. I should not be prepared to hold that a member of a council, even though he were advised by the clerk that an act that he was proposing to do was not lawful, would necessarily be guilty of misconduct if, nevertheless, honestly believing that the advice which was given to him was erroneous, he proceeded to do that act."

In Davies v. Cowperthwaite (2) BRANSON, J., was not dealing with a case of negligence. He was dealing with a case of misconduct, and in so far as he approved or agreed with the observations of LORD O'BRIEN in R. v. Browne (1) his remarks were clearly obiter dicta, and, therefore, his view is not binding on us. The view I take of s. 228 (1) (d) is that it means what it says—that it is the duty of the district auditor "to surcharge the amount of any loss or deficiency upon any person by whose negligence or misconduct the loss or deficiency has been incurred."

Epithets applied to negligence, so far as the common law is concerned, are meaningless. Negligence is well known and well defined. A man is either guilty of negligence or he is not. Gross negligence is not known to the English common law so far as civil proceedings are concerned, and one has only to consider the phrase in criminal cases, particularly in cases of manslaughter. My view is that the word "negligence" in s. 228 (1) means negligence as used in its ordinary sense, and that the district auditor used the wrong phrase when he referred to "gross negligence." He did so, apparently, because that was his interpretation of both the Irish case and the decision of BRANSON, J.

A If the district auditor's decision had stood with that finding alone, this court would have had to say that he had applied the wrong test in considering whether there had been loss occasioned by negligence or not, but, on reading the whole of his finding, it is seen that, although he says there was no evidence of gross negligence, his actual findings amount to a finding of no negligence on the part of either the officials of the council or the council. For that reason, although he has used the wrong phrase in framing his decision as to the test to be applied, if the correct test were applied, the result, in my view, would be the same. In those circumstances, I would dismiss the appeal.

B LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I agree. I desire to add a few words in regard to Davies v. Cowperthwaite (2) and the use of the expression "gross negligence" in the district auditor's finding. In Davies v. Cowperthwaite (2) the court relied on and approved the decision of the Irish Court in R. v. Browne (1). Both those cases dealt with misconduct and not with negligence. The allegation in both was that the council, having received certain advice, disregarded the advice and made the payments, and it was said that that was misconduct. If the court in Ireland thought that the same test should be applied to negligence as to misconduct, with all respect to them I disagree. The judgment in Davies v. Cowperthwaite (2) was, in fact, obiter in so far as it dealt with negligence. The use of the expression "gross negligence" is always misleading. Except in the one case when the law relating to manslaughter is being considered, the words "gross negligence" should never be used in connection with any matter to which the common law relates because negligence is a breach of duty, and, if there is a duty and there has been a breach of it which causes loss, it matters not whether it is a venial breach or a serious breach. A breach of a legal duty in any degree which causes loss, is actionable. The expression crassa negligentia has generally been used by equity judges in considering cases relating to the degree of duty owed by directors, and if such cases as Overend & Gurney Co. v. Gibb (3), and Re Faure Electric Accumulator Co. (4) are understood, I believe it will always be found that the court was dealing with the degree of duty which the directors owe, and where they have been held not liable, although it has been contended that they have been guilty of crassa negligentia, it is because the court has found the duty has not been broken. All that has been found against the director is that he has been guilty of an error of judgment or a want of judgment, which is not enough to hold him liable. Where it is a matter of the duty which is imposed, either by statute or by common law, any breach of the duty is enough, provided it causes loss, to impose liability. I can see no ground for reading into the clear words of this statute "by whose negligence or misconduct the loss or deficiency has been incurred," the word "gross," or holding that the section should be construed as referring to gross negligence and not to any degree of negligence. I agree that this appeal fails, because the only true interpretation of the district auditor's findings in this case is that there was no negligence.

H DEVLIN, J.: I agree, and I add a few words only because we are differing from the obiter dicta contained in R. v. Browne (1), and in the judgment in Davies v. Cowperthwaite (2) of BRANSON, J. (and HUMPHREYS, J., agreed with his judgment)—obiter dicta which, of course, have high persuasive authority. I think the construction of the statute must be approached by assuming that prima facie the word "negligence" is used in every statute in its ordinary common law meaning, and I am not satisfied that the mere fact that it has been used as an alternative to misconduct affects its meaning in any way, either by adding to it the epithet "gross," which my Lord has pointed out is one which should be discouraged in relation to the common law, or by adding to it any element of moral culpability. Moreover, I should have thought that the wording of the statute itself suggests the contrary. Clearly, negligence is intended to be an alternative to misconduct, and if there is added to negligence the element of moral culpability, it is difficult to see what the distinction is between negligence with moral culpability and misconduct. I think, therefore, that the right construction of the word "negligence" is its ordinary meaning, which my Lord has assigned to it. It does not follow that every mistake or every want of judgment or every error of judgment on the part of any council or official will lead to a surcharge. The test will be that of negligence in its ordinary sense, which is commonly applied in these courts.

Appeal dismissed.

VITKOVICE HORNÍ A HUTNÍ TEZIRSTVO v. KORNER.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Tucker), April 4, 5, 9, 10, June 20, 1951.]

Practice—Service—Service out of jurisdiction—Breach of contract committed within jurisdiction—Proof of breach—Contracts to pay pension and salary as consultant—Contracts made in Czechoslovakia—Monies alleged to be payable in England—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e)—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4.

The respondent applied under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), for leave to serve notice of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction on the appellants, a Czechoslovak company, in an action in which he claimed sums of money alleged to be due to him under two agreements, on the ground that, under the contracts between the parties, the money was, in the events which had happened, payable in England. The respondent, formerly a Czechoslovakian, but now a naturalised British subject, had been a servant of the appellants and the agreements were made in Czechoslovakia, one being a pensions agreement and the other an agreement for his services as a consultant after his retirement on the understanding that he would reside in England, France or Switzerland. Shortly after his retirement in 1938, he came to live in England, where he had remained ever since. In support of the allegation that breaches of the contracts took place in England, evidence was given on behalf of the respondent that under Czechoslovakian law, failing contrary agreement, it was the duty of a debtor to pay his creditor wherever he might be residing. On May 15, 1946, an order was made granting the application, but on Nov. 22, 1948, on an application by the appellants under R.S.C., Ord. 12, r. 30, the order was set aside by a master whose decision was affirmed by the judge on June 28, 1949. The learned judge held that he had no jurisdiction to grant leave for service out of the jurisdiction because he was not satisfied that there had been a breach of either of the contracts within the jurisdiction. The respondent appealed from this decision and the Court of Appeal allowed his appeal and restored the order of May 15, 1946, with a qualification that, if it appeared that the claim under the service agreement was not payable within the jurisdiction, the respondent was not to obtain judgment on that head of claim.

HELD: (i) on an application for leave to serve notice of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), the burden on the plaintiff, under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, was, not to "satisfy" the court that he was right, but to make it sufficiently to appear that the case was a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction, and for this purpose it was not necessary to prove the fact beyond all reasonable doubt, provided that there was a good arguable case; the learned judge, therefore, was wrong in thinking that he had no jurisdiction to grant leave for service out of the jurisdiction because he was not "satisfied" that there had been a breach within the jurisdiction, and, as he did not purport to exercise his discretion, it was competent for the Court of Appeal to review his order and to exercise their discretion under Ord. 11, r. 4; and, on the evidence, the case was a proper one for leave to be given for service out of the jurisdiction.

Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska ([1946] 2 All E.R. 663), considered.

(ii) in granting leave to serve notice of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction, it was not desirable for the court to introduce into the order an undertaking by the respondent, in the form used in Thomas v. Hamilton (Dowager Duchess) (1886) (17 Q.B.D. 592), such a practice being not within the spirit of R.S.C., Ord. 11.

APPEAL by the defendants, a Czechoslovak company, from an order of the Court of Appeal (BUCKNILL and SINGLETON, L.JJ., DENNING, L.J., dissentiente), dated Feb. 13, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 558, reversing an order of SLADE, J., made in chambers and dated June 28, 1949.

On May 15, 1946, the respondent obtained an ex parte order from Master MOSELEY, under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), for leave to serve on the appellants notice of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction in an action claiming sums of money alleged to be due to him under two agreements (a pension agreement and a service agreement) made in Czechoslovakia, on the ground that the monies were payable to him in England. On Nov. 2, 1948, on an application under R.S.C., Ord. 12, r. 30, by the appellants, who had entered a conditional appearance to the writ, an order was made by Master GRUNDY setting aside the order of

May 15, 1946, and this latter order was upheld by SLADE, J., on the ground that he was not satisfied that there had been a breach of the contracts within the jurisdiction, and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to grant leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction. On an appeal by the respondent, the Court of Appeal held that he was entitled to an order for service out of the jurisdiction and restored the order of May 15, 1946, with a qualification that, if it appeared that the claim under the service agreement was not payable within the jurisdiction, the respondent was not to obtain judgment on that head of claim.

Beney, K.C., and Clive Burt for the appellants.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and Dennis Lloyd for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

June 20. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, in my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed. For that reason I intend to confine my remarks within the narrowest limits, for I do not wish in any way to prejudice any issue which may come before the court for determination.

It is not easy to state with precision the question now before the House. It will emerge when I have briefly stated the relevant facts. On May 15, 1946, the respondent, Emil Korner, formerly a Czechoslovakian, but since 1947 a naturalised British subject, applied ex parte at chambers in the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice for leave to issue a writ against the appellants, a Czechoslovakian company, claiming certain sums which he alleged to be due to him under two agreements described in these proceedings as the pension agreement and the service agreement, and for leave to serve notice of this writ on the appellants out of the jurisdiction. The application, which was founded on that part of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), which provides that such service may be allowed by the court where the action is "... brought against a defendant not domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, in respect of a breach committed within the jurisdiction of a contract wherever made ..."

was duly granted by Master MOSELEY. The appellants entered a conditional appearance to the writ and on Jan. 15, 1947, applied in chambers that the order of Master MOSELEY and the writ of summons issued pursuant thereto and all subsequent proceedings should be set aside. The grounds of this application were (i) that there was no jurisdiction to make the order or to try the action; (ii) that, if there was jurisdiction, the discretion of the court should not be exercised in favour of the respondent; and (iii) that the forum conveniens was in the republic of Czechoslovakia. On this application a number of affidavits were filed, a considerable delay occurred, and it was not until Nov. 22, 1948, that Master GRUNDY made an order setting aside the order of Master MOSELEY and the writ of summons in the action, the notice thereof ordered to be served out of the jurisdiction and the service thereof, and all subsequent proceedings. From this order the respondent appealed to SLADE, J., who on June 28, 1949, dismissed the appeal, but gave the respondent leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal. He appealed accordingly and on Feb. 13, 1950, that court (BUCKNILL and SINGLETON, L.J.J., DENNING, L.J., dissentiente) allowed his appeal and restored the order of Master MOSELEY with a qualification to which I shall refer later. From that order the present appellants have by leave appealed to this House. The grounds of their appeal remain those which I have already stated as founding the application to Master GRUNDY, with the formidable addition that they now further contend that the Court of Appeal ought not to have interfered with the exercise by the learned judge of a discretion vested in him by the Rules of the Supreme Court. To this the respondent replies that the learned judge did not purport to exercise his discretion in the matter at all, but, adopting (as the respondent contends) a wrong construction of the relevant rules, held that he had no jurisdiction to make the order, and the respondent adds that the Court of Appeal exercised its discretion on right principles and, therefore, that its order should not be disturbed.

My Lords, to me it appears that the crux of the matter lies in the question whether the learned judge did exercise his discretion, and did so on right principles, and, having studied his careful judgment with the greatest attention, I have come to the conclusion that he did not. As I have said, the respondent relied on the allegation that there had been a breach or breaches within the jurisdiction of two agreements. It was common ground between the parties that the agreements were made in Czechoslovakia and that the law of that country was "the law of the contract" and that the appellants were there resident. The jurisdiction of the court, therefore, only arose if the action was brought in respect of a breach of the agreements committed within the jurisdiction, and, even if the jurisdiction was established, it was a discretionary jurisdiction which must be exercised with caution and with a bias against invading the sovereignty of a foreign State. These matters were well appreciated by the learned judge, but, as I think, it was in his construction or application of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, that he fell into error. That rule, which applies equally to an application under any of the heads of r. 1, provides:

E

F

H

"Every application for leave to serve such writ or notice on a defendant out of the jurisdiction shall be supported by affidavit or other evidence, stating that in the belief of the deponent the plaintiff has a good cause of action . . . and the grounds upon which the application is made; and no such leave shall be granted unless it shall be made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this order."

The learned judge concludes his judgment with these words:

"For the reasons I have given, I hold that the court has no jurisdiction in the circumstances of this case, because I am not satisfied that there has been any breach of either of these contracts within the jurisdiction and for the further reasons that I have given in the case of the service agreement. I base my judgment solely on that and I decide nothing at all, because it is unnecessary to decide it, on the question of what discretion I would have exercised had it become necessary to consider what was the forum conveniens."

I do not think that the learned judge can have meant that it is only on the question of forum conveniens that it is the duty of the court to exercise a discretion, but, however that may be, it is, I think, clear that the judge, holding that he had no jurisdiction, did not purport in any way to exercise his discretion.

Why, then, did the learned judge hold that the court had no jurisdiction to grant leave? It was, he says, because he was not satisfied that there was a breach within the jurisdiction. This is the meaning which, following certain observations of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska (1), he places on the words of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4:

"... made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this order."

But, my Lords, whether the issue is as to the making of a contract within the jurisdiction (r. 1 (e) (i)), or the making of it by an agent trading or residing within the jurisdiction on behalf of a principal trading or residing out of the jurisdiction (r. 1 (e) (ii)), or as to the law which by its terms or by implication governs it (r. 1 (e) (iii)), or as to the place where the alleged breach has been committed, the obligation of the plaintiff is, not to "satisfy" the court that he is right, but to make it sufficiently appear that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under the order. As LORD DAVEY said (90 L.T. 735) in Chemische Fabrik vormals Sandoz v. Badische Anilin und Soda Fabriks (2):

"This [i.e., r. 4] does not, of course, mean that a mere statement by any deponent who is put forward to make the affidavit that he believes that there is a good cause of action is sufficient. On the other hand, the court is not, on an application for leave to serve out of the jurisdiction . . . called upon to try the action or express a premature opinion on its merits . . ."

Yet, as I read the judgment of the learned judge (and here, too, I think, he founds on the observations of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Malik's case (1)), he adopted a standard of proof in regard to the place of breach which, in effect, amounted to a trial of the action or a premature expression of opinion on its merits. For example, one reason, but not the only reason, why the respondent alleged that there was a breach within the jurisdiction was that, as he swore in an affidavit made, it is true, somewhat late in the proceedings, there was an express agreement made between himself and a representative of the appellants that payment under the pension agreement should be made in London if he was resident in London. It could not possibly be said that the allegation was on the face of it false or frivolous. On the contrary, SINGLETON, L.J., in the Court of Appeal said that the court ought to accept it. At the highest, it could be said that it was open to doubt until it had been tested by cross-examination and examined in the light of any other evidence that might be adduced at the trial. Therefore, when the learned judge said that he was not "satisfied" that there had been a breach within the jurisdiction, he can only have meant that the respondent had not proved that fact beyond all reasonable doubt. That, however, is something quite different from the burden which the rule imposes, for a plaintiff can make it sufficiently appear that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction while falling short of the standard of proof which must be attained at the trial. If it were not so, it would become the duty of the court to do just what LORD DAVEY said was not its duty, viz., to try the action on the preliminary application.

It is, no doubt, difficult to say precisely what test must be passed for an applicant to make it sufficiently appear that the case is a proper one. I do not wholly like the expression "a prima facie case," for, where leave to serve has been given ex parte under R.S.C., Ord. 11, and application is then made under R.S.C., Ord. 12, r. 30, to set the proceedings aside, a conflict may arise in which the question is not so much whether a prima facie case has been made out as whether, on all the materials then before him, the judge is of opinion that the case—I can find no better word—is a proper one to be heard in our courts. The description "a good arguable case" has been suggested and I do not quarrel with it. For the purpose of this appeal, however, it is sufficient to say negatively that the learned judge fell into error in thinking that the court had no jurisdiction to grant leave because he was not "satisfied" that there had been a breach within the jurisdiction. On this footing it was clearly competent for the Court of Appeal to review the judge's order and in the exercise of their discretion to make such order as they thought fit. In that court BUCKNILL, L.J., giving, as I think, the proper force and effect to R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, entertained jurisdiction and restored the order of Master MOSELEY. I see no ground for saying that he exercised his discretion on wrong principles. On the contrary, if the matter were res integra, I should have exercised it in the same way. SINGLETON, L.J., reached the same result, but, as I venture to think, used, perhaps per incuriam, language which is not accurate, for he too suggests that there is a special standard of proof required where it is alleged that a breach occurred within the jurisdiction. The plaintiff must, says the lord justice ([1950] 1 All E.R. 572), "show it to the satisfaction of the court." If this expression has the meaning which SLADE, J., attributed to it, it is not what the rule requires. Inasmuch, however, as the lord justice concluded that the respondent had passed the test, whatever it was, it followed that the jurisdiction of the court was founded, and, this being so, the lord justice in the exercise of his discretion allowed the appeal. I see no reason for saying that he exercised it wrongly. DENNING, L.J., would have dismissed the appeal, but, as I think, he, too, adopted the test which it was assumed had been laid down by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Malik's case (1), and on that footing was constrained to express an opinion on many questions on which any opinion must be premature until the trial of the action. On these and other matters I have abstained from giving my own opinion, for I am conscious that I have not all the materials which will be available at the trial.

At the opening of this opinion I said that the Court of Appeal had by its order made a qualification on the order made by Master MOSELEY. That arises in this way. There were, as I have said, two agreements of which breaches were alleged. In regard to one of these, called the salary agreement, BUCKNILL, L.J., felt more doubt whether there had been a breach within the jurisdiction, and, accordingly, though I think SINGLETON, L.J., somewhat unwillingly concurred in this, the court required from the respondent an undertaking, which was embodied in the order, that, if it appeared at the trial of the action that the salary, in respect of which the respondent claimed, was not payable within the jurisdiction, the respondent would not ask for such salary, in so far as the sum was not payable within the jurisdiction, or interest thereon, or damages for breach of contract to pay the same. In this the court followed the precedent of Thomas v. Dowager Duchess of Hamilton (3). So far as I am aware, it has rarely, if ever, been followed, and I do not think that it is a desirable form of order, but the respondent has not cross-appealed and I think, in the circumstances, that it would not be right to deprive the appellants of whatever advantage they may get from it. It will be sufficient, therefore, if the House dismisses this appeal, and I move accordingly.

My noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, who is unable to be here, has asked me to say that he concurs in the opinion which I have read.

LORD OAKSEY (read by LORD RADCLIFFE): My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. I do not think it is possible to distinguish between the standard of proof required under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) (i), r. 1 (e) (ii), and r. 1 (e) (iii), and the other grounds on which an application is made under the rule. The court must decide in every case whether it is a proper case for service out of the jurisdiction. It is true that, so far as that decision is concerned, it is final and will not be litigated again at the trial, but the fact that it is an interlocutory decision decided on affidavit evidence and the words "unless it shall be made sufficiently to appear to the court" indicate that it is equally on all points a discretionary matter. It is clear, I think, that SLADE, J., adopted different standards of proof as a matter of law in regard to the matters which he had to decide, and I am, therefore, of opinion that the Court of Appeal were right in holding that he had misdirected himself and that it was necessary for them to exercise their discretion under the rule. The majority of the Court of Appeal were of opinion that this is a proper case for service out of the jurisdiction and I do not think that the exercise of their discretion ought to be interfered with. Even if there were only the slightest evidence as to the breach of the pensions agreement having been committed within the jurisdiction, the evidence as to forum conveniens is, in my opinion, such as to make it sufficiently to appear that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I think that the problems of construing and applying the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 11, have been invested with something more of mystery than they properly require. Some of the difficulties which have arisen may be traced to a tendency to treat r. 1 of the order as if it were not part of a scheme which included r. 4 as well, whereas, as I conceive, the key to the procedure lies in a proper construction of r. 4. Service out of the jurisdiction is, of course, an exceptional measure. The ordinary principles of international comity are invaded by permitting it, and that quite apart from the question whether judgment will, or will not, ultimately be given against the person served. It is only natural, therefore, that the courts should approach with circumspection any request for leave to issue a writ against such a person. Rule 1 defines the circumstances in which a judge may in his discretion allow such a writ to be served, but, if r. 1 stood alone, the judge would be left in the dilemma of choosing between asking no more of the applicant than his assertion that the action which he desires to bring involves one or more of the qualifying conditions (which would be to ask less than the language of the rule seems to require) and asking the applicant to establish beyond reasonable doubt by appropriate evidence that the necessary conditions are, in fact, fulfilled (which would be, in effect, to try the case ex parte before it had been heard). Neither alternative presents itself to me as reasonable, and I think that the measure of the judge's duty must be found within the words of r. 4. This rule prescribes the procedure which is to be observed on every application under the order, and it is well to recall that the order is dealing from first to last with what must be by its nature an ex parte application. There must be affidavit or other evidence stating that in the belief of the deponent the plaintiff has a good cause of action. The evidence must show in what place or country the proposed defendant may be found and whether he is a British subject or not, and, finally, it must disclose the grounds on which the application is made. I cannot feel any doubt that the word "grounds" is adequate to cover the alleged facts which bring the case within r. 1 as well as any additional facts which are relevant to the exercise of the court's discretion, and this requirement by itself seems to me to show that the judge is expected to exercise some more critical function than that of merely accepting the statement on affidavit that the plaintiff is believed to have a good cause of action. Indeed, that belief would be quite consistent with the absence of any of the conditions necessary to justify service out of the jurisdiction. The last direction contained in r. 4 is in form a prohibition:

"... no such leave shall be granted unless it shall be made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this order."

I suggest, however, to your Lordships that it is from these words, and these words alone, that it is possible to ascertain what measure of proof the judge should require before deciding that he is authorised to make an order under this procedure. It must sufficiently appear to him that it is a proper case. The phrase is a composite one and it is not elucidated by taking it to pieces, but it seems to me clear that the use of the word "sufficiently" in this context shows that it is not necessary that the judge should be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt as to the existence of the qualifying conditions. Further, a case does not sufficiently appear to be a proper case for the purposes of this order unless, on consideration of all admissible material, there remains a strong argument for the opinion that the qualifying conditions are, indeed, satisfied.

My Lords, it is thus that I construe this order, and I do so with all respect to the views of those who have much greater experience than I have in the practical task of applying it. I turn now to see how the construction which I have adopted accords with the views of the learned judges who have dealt with this matter in the courts below. Strictly speaking, they were not dealing with an application under R.S.C., Ord. 11. They were dealing with an application under R.S.C., Ord. 12, r. 30, to discharge an order already made. I think, however, that the principles which govern the making of an order must govern a decision to revoke it when made. SLADE, J., in his most lucid judgment, has divided his responsibility between that of requiring no more than a prima facie case for the existence of a contract and of a breach of it and that of requiring to be satisfied on the evidence that a breach has, in fact, taken place within the jurisdiction. I think that there are two criticisms to be made of this view of the law. One is that R.S.C., Ord. 11, gives no ground for drawing a distinction between the standard of proof necessary to establish one of its requirements and the standard of proof necessary to establish another, nor have I myself been able to work through the logical process of being satisfied as to where a breach of contract had taken place without being, at any rate, as much satisfied that the contract existed and had been broken. The other criticism is that "a prima facie case" puts the standard of proof somewhat too low, while to be "satisfied" puts it somewhat too high. These are, of course, only words, and I do not wish to chop their meaning overfine.

I prefer, however, the test of a strong case for argument which I have just suggested. A prima facie case may not be much short of this when the application is, as it always is under Ord. 11, ex parte, but when the next stage is reached and an application is made to set aside the service after conditional appearance, which is the form of application which your Lordships are dealing with here, I confess that I do not know what exactly is conveyed by "a prima facie case." There is

A voluminous affidavit evidence on both sides, some of it conflicting, and the affair seems to me at this stage to have passed beyond the point at which anything can properly be said to possess a prima facie validity. If, at such a stage, a judge requires to be satisfied as to the existence of one or more of the qualifying conditions before he regards himself as free to act, I think that he is requiring that all reasonable doubt should have been eliminated from his mind. I think

B that that is to go too far in favour of the defendant and to give him more than he can be entitled to on any general principle.

In deciding as he did, the learned judge thought that he was applying a principle laid down by the Court of Appeal in Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska (1). I daresay that he was right in thinking that that case did contain a statement of principle which was binding on him, but, if it did, I think

C that the principle was not rightly expressed and I have given my reasons for so thinking. No sufficient purpose would be served, therefore, if I were to scrutinise the language which was used by the court in the Malik case (1), nor would it be of any real assistance to your Lordships to observe on some of the phrases which have been used in this case and in that on previous occasions. The order which is now under review is concerned essentially with a matter of procedure and in

D all but exceptional cases that procedure ends naturally and the more happily with an exercise of his discretion by the judge in chambers. It so happens that on this occasion a divergence of views in the courts below has left your Lordships with the duty of analysing the language of the order and endeavouring to state with precision what are the principles according to which it should be applied. I do not myself think that its language presents any very great difficulty so long

E as it is approached with two main considerations in mind. The first is that authority to sanction the issue of a writ outside the jurisdiction is not lightly to be assumed. The second is that both the nature of the case and the wording of r. 4 itself show that the existence of the conditions which govern the authority cannot be ascertained with the same finality as would be appropriate at a trial, in which evidence and argument could be exhaustively deployed.

F My Lords, on the substance of the appeal I agree with the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal, though I am not altogether in agreement with their respective constructions of the order or of their methods of applying it. What determines me is that, when the evidence is weighed, there remains a strong argument for the respondent's contention that in respect of each of his heads of claim there has been a breach within the jurisdiction. I will take, first, the service

G agreement, and I do not think it desirable at this stage to do more than indicate briefly to your Lordships what are the considerations which have weighed with me. It looks as if there were some instalments due under that agreement which have never been paid or set off against a debit on account. The payments were stipulated to be due in sterling and they were agreed on at a time when the respondent was going to leave Czechoslovakia, was not going to leave Europe, and was expected to reside in England, France or Switzerland. Add to this that

H it does not seem to be disputed between the Czechoslovakian lawyers that, failing contrary agreement, the appellants as debtors would have to make payment to the respondent as creditor wherever he might be residing and that the respondent has deposed that before 1938 he had nominated Rothschilds' bank in London as the place of payment, and I think that he is left at this stage with a good case for his argument that there has been a breach of this agreement within the jurisdiction.

The pensions agreement stands on rather a different footing. The obligation was expressed in terms of Czechoslovakian currency and the agreement was made in Czechoslovakia in respect of service to and a pension from the appellants, a Czechoslovakian concern. All these circumstances, however, are, perhaps, not very strong to determine the place of payment, when it is recalled that pension payments are intended for those who have severed their connection with the company, their service being over. A company operating in Central Europe, with international connections, might well anticipate that its pensioners would be found living outside the country and make provision accordingly. The appellants have deposed that, under the pensions scheme, pensions accrued due and were payable in Czech crowns in Moravaka Ostrava. The document which sets out the terms of the scheme has not been put in evidence and the appellants have only themselves to thank, as I see it, that we are not in a position to study it. However that may be, the respondent's rights depend directly, not on the general scheme, but on the promise that was made to him in the letter dated Jan. 18, 1929. By this letter, the appellants have undertaken that he should have made up to him any difference in value if the value of the Czech crown came to be reduced by more than ten per cent. of its then gold value. Such an undertaking does not bear directly on the question where payment was to be made, but it is only consistent with the assumption that the parties were at that time contemplating that the respondent would or might require to be paid outside Czechoslovakia. It is, I think, significant that the appellants kept his account with them under the heading "Ausl. Kc" [foreign Czech crowns]. It suggests strongly that they recognised that he was entitled to be paid abroad. The explanation which the appellants' witness has offered as to the import of that entry seems to me in itself inexplicable. On the whole, therefore, the respondent seems to me to have made out a good argument for the view that what appears to be the general rule of Czechoslovakian law should be applied and that his residence in this country entitles him to be paid in this country.

Your Lordships will observe that I have hitherto made no reference to the special assurance which the respondent says that he received from the late Dr. Sonnenschein at the time of the negotiation of his pension agreement. That assurance was first introduced into this case by the respondent's further affidavit of June 9, 1948. I have not taken it into account, much as it influenced the views of the majority of the Court of Appeal. I do not think it necessary to do so, having regard to the other considerations to which I have already alluded, and, for my part, I would not feel altogether happy at giving weight at this stage of the proceedings to an oral assurance made in 1929 and forgotten so long and so profoundly by the respondent, who now, alone, can depose to it. The distinction between remitting monies from Czechoslovakia to be received in London and making payment in London out of resources provided from Czechoslovakia is itself a fine one, and I could feel no sufficient confidence that such an assurance, so recollected, would enable me to choose the right alternative.

If one comes to the point of concluding that, on this application, it has been made sufficiently to appear that the breaches complained of took place within the jurisdiction, the case presents itself to me as in all other respects a proper one for leave to be given for service abroad. I regret the introduction of an undertaking by the respondent into the order made by the Court of Appeal. To exact such an undertaking is to revive the form of order made in Thomas v. Dowager Duchess of Hamilton (3). I think that the objection to such a practice is that it is not really within the spirit of R.S.C., Ord. 11. It is the duty of the judge at that preliminary stage to make up his mind whether the evidence and arguments justify the exercise of his discretion. If they do, there is no reason why the plaintiff should be further embarrassed by an undertaking of this kind, but the judge must make up his mind before he exercises his special authority to allow service in another jurisdiction and, if he cannot feel sufficient confidence as to the existence of the required conditions, it is to evade the issue to allow proceedings to go ahead and to defer until the trial what should have been the preliminary determination of the matter.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, in setting aside the order for service of notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction in the present case, SLADE, J., dealt with the application by following, as he thought, the line indicated as appropriate to such cases by LORD GODDARD, C.J., sitting as a member of the Court of Appeal in Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska (1). The first and all-important question in this appeal is whether in so doing he misdirected himself and thereby left the Court of Appeal free to exercise its own discretion as it thought fit. If he did not misdirect himself, then his decision should stand, since the operation of the machinery of R.S.C., Ord. 11, is for the master and judge in chambers, and it is, in my view, clear that there was ample material in the present case on which a judge in chambers in the exercise of his discretion could have decided either to allow or to refuse service out of the jurisdiction. Indeed, the difference of judicial opinion as to the facts and inferences which should be drawn from the evidence which has manifested itself at different stages in this appeal is in itself sufficient to show how different judges may quite properly take different views as to the manner in which they would exercise their discretion. The language used by LORD GODDARD, C.J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 664) in Malik's case (1) and applied by SLADE, J., was as follows:

“The first thing that the plaintiff has to show is that he is bringing his action in respect of a breach committed within the jurisdiction. I say at once that I cannot accede to the part of the argument of counsel for the plaintiff in which he says that the question whether there is a breach, and the question whether it is committed within the jurisdiction, stand exactly on the same footing. The court in these cases must approach the matter on the footing of the assumption that there has been a breach, and then they have to consider whether or not the breach has been committed within the jurisdiction because it is only if the breach has been committed within the jurisdiction that this court can allow the writ to be served out of the jurisdiction. The case to which counsel referred as supporting his argument that the two matters are on exactly the same footing is Hemelryck v. Lyall Shipbuilding Co. (4) in the Privy Council, but I do not think that that case goes anything like the length that he asks us to go for this reason. No doubt, when the court is considering whether it will give leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction the court wants to see that there is, at least, an arguable case. If it can see, by what appears on the affidavits, that the case put up is a groundless or frivolous one, the court can refuse to give leave because it can say: Whether you allege a breach within the jurisdiction or not, you are putting up a case which on the face of it is groundless and we are not going to allow notice of a writ to be served, wherever the breach took place. On the other hand, the court, having looked at the affidavits, could say that there were disclosed on the affidavits facts which, if they were proved at the trial, would show that there had been a contract and breach of the contract. The action has to be in respect of the breach of contract. The court on this application is not going to inquire whether the case is one in which the plaintiff must necessarily succeed, but, if they see on the face of the proceedings that it is a groundless action, no doubt, they will not allow an order to go for service out of the jurisdiction. As a general rule, the court will approach the case on the footing that the plaintiff has got a case which can be properly put before the court and argued, and one in which, if the court finds in accordance with the facts alleged by him, the result would probably be judgment for him. When, however, it comes to the question whether a breach has been committed within the jurisdiction, that is another and very different proposition. We have been reminded by counsel for the bank during the course of the argument that r. 4 of Ord. 11 expressly says that: "... no such leave shall be granted unless it shall be made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this order." Therefore, the court has to be satisfied on the affidavits that the action is brought in respect of a breach committed within the jurisdiction."

Before considering this language, it is to be remembered that it has frequently been laid down that this jurisdiction is to be exercised with great care and that any doubts should be resolved in favour of the foreigner. For example, see per FARWELL, L.J. ([1908] P. 201) in The Hagen (5). As I read LORD GODDARD's words, he is saying no more than that, before it is "made sufficiently to appear to the court" that notice of a writ should be served out of the jurisdiction, the court will require more cogent evidence with regard to those matters, which may not thereafter be the subject of any further investigation, than in the case of those issues which will necessarily be fought out at the trial. Take for example a case of tort under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (ee). Suppose it is sought to serve notice of a writ out of the jurisdiction in respect of a collision at sea alleged to have taken place within the jurisdiction, the court will not be concerned to enter into the question of the negligence of the defendants provided that the affidavits disclose a case which appears to merit consideration at the trial, but, assuming negligence, it should, in my opinion, require cogent evidence pointing to a strong probability that the collision occurred within the jurisdiction before it will allow service out of the jurisdiction, this being an issue which may never arise at the trial and which, if it does arise, and if it be proved that the collision took place outside the jurisdiction, will not divest the court of the jurisdiction it has wrongly assumed. The Fagernes (6) is an example of such a case. In dealing with cases of contract, it is more difficult to define the position with precision, though no difficulty, I think, arises in practice. If the plaintiff is relying on a breach of contract within the jurisdiction, it may be necessary, as in the present case, to show the existence of a contract containing as one of its terms a provision, express or implied, for payment in England. It is then said: How can it be true to say that the court will readily assume the existence of the contract, but will require cogent evidence that the breach took place within the jurisdiction, when this depends on what the terms of the contract were? How, it is said, can one have different standards of proof of one and the same thing?

My Lords, this appears to me a mere question of words. In such a case as the present, there is no dispute that contracts had been made for the payment, in one case of salary, and in the other of pension. The judge was not concerned to inquire closely to ascertain all the terms of these contracts, or whether or not the defendants might have a sufficient set-off to extinguish their alleged indebtedness thereunder, but he was, as I think, concerned to inquire and to satisfy himself that the probabilities of the case were strongly in favour of the plaintiff's contention that the contracts contained a term providing for payment in England. I do not think it is quite accurate to say that there are different standards of proof required in each case. The rule is dealing with an interlocutory application. There is no issue which has to be "proved" in the sense that matters in issue require to be proved at a trial. It has to "be made sufficiently to appear to the ... judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this order", and this involves that it must be made sufficiently to appear to him that there has been a breach within the jurisdiction and this may involve it being made sufficiently to appear to him that the contract relied on contained a term requiring payment in England. I cannot think that, when LORD GODDARD, C.J., used the words "the court has to be satisfied", in Malik's case (1), he meant anything more than what I have endeavoured to express above. "Made sufficiently to appear" is an awkward expression which can, I think, be conveniently and accurately expressed as "satisfied" without it being thought that he thereby meant that it had to be "proved" as issues require to be proved at a trial.

A My Lords, I agree with the analysis of Ord. 11, which has been made by my noble and learned friend, LORD RADCLIFFE, and his statement of the principles according to which it should be applied, but I find nothing therein inconsistent with the view which I have endeavoured to express that the cogency of the evidence required to justify an order for leave to serve out of the jurisdiction may vary with regard to the different matters which fall to be considered before such an order can be made. I feel considerable doubt whether SLADE, J., misdirected himself in the present case, but I am not prepared to dissent from the conclusion reached by your Lordships that he used language calculated to give the impression that he considered that a breach within the jurisdiction had to be proved to the same extent as matters in issue must be proved at a trial, and that he appeared to think the exercise of his discretion would only be required with regard to the forum conveniens. This being the position, it was open to the Court of Appeal to exercise their own discretion and no grounds exist for disturbing the exercise of that discretion by the majority of the court. I have, however, I think, already sufficiently indicated that I respectfully feel unable to agree with the view expressed by BUCKNILL, L.J., towards the end of his judgment where C he says ([1950] 1 All E.R. 567):

D "I think that the concluding words of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, applicable as they are to all the instances of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1, only require that in each case and on every material part of it the court must not act merely on vague statements, such as statements based on information and belief, or on statements which are obviously untrue, or, as contended in The Brabo (7), on statements that the law as to the liability of the party sued here is difficult and complicated, and that the matter had better be left to be decided by the trial judge. Having regard to the general principles laid down in The Hagen (5), that will not suffice. In each case the plaintiff must, as I think, make out a prima facie case, and, if that case is based on facts which E are put in issue, nevertheless leave should be given."

F If this is the test, it would seem that an ex parte order for service out of the jurisdiction can seldom, if ever, be set aside on further evidence if a prima facie case has been shown on the original application. I agree that the introduction of an undertaking by the respondent into the order in the form used in Thomas v. Dowager Duchess of Hamilton (3) is undesirable. For the reasons which I have stated, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HARRISON v. HARRISON.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), June 1, 22, 1951.]

Divorce—Custody—Child born before marriage—Not legitimated per subsequens matrimonium—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 26 (1).

The term "children" in s. 26 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, does not include a child born out of wedlock in circumstances which prevent the child being legitimated by the subsequent marriage of the parents. Accordingly, on the dissolution of the parents' marriage, no order for the custody of the child can be made.

SUMMONS by the wife in a suit for dissolution of marriage for an order for the custody of a child.

J. B. Gardner for the wife.

The husband was not represented.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 22. BARNARD, J., read the following judgment. This is a summons by a wife claiming an order for custody in respect of a child. The husband, by letter, admits that he is the father of the child and consents to the wife having custody. The wife is Clarice Harrison and she married the husband, Alfred Harrison, on Apr. 24, 1943. She had given birth to the child in question on Apr. 22, 1938. At the time of the birth of the child the wife and the husband were living in adultery, the wife being then married to Arthur Henry Harrison, who subsequently divorced her on the ground of her adultery with the husband. This child cannot, therefore, be legitimated under the Legitimacy Act, 1926. On Mar. 13, 1951, the wife obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage with the husband, and in her petition she claimed custody of the child, but this question was referred by the commissioner, who heard the case, to the judge in chambers. The decree was made absolute on May 17, 1951. On July 10, 1947, the wife had applied to a court of summary jurisdiction for maintenance for herself and the child and was awarded maintenance for herself only, her application in respect of the child being dismissed.

Counsel for the wife relies on the wording of s. 26 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which reads:

"In any proceedings for divorce or nullity of marriage or judicial separation, the court may from time to time, either before or by or after the final decree, make such provision as appears just with respect to the custody, maintenance and education of the children the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings, or, if it thinks fit, direct proper proceedings to be taken for placing the children under the protection of the court."

Counsel for the wife emphasised the difference between the wording of that section and the wording of s. 5 (b) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, which gives the court jurisdiction inter alia to make an order that the legal custody of any child of the marriage between the applicant and the husband, while under the age of sixteen years, be committed to the applicant. He submitted that under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, the only test to apply was parenthood, and in support of his argument he quoted some dicta of DENNING, J., in M. v. M. (1). In that case DENNING, J., decided that the section, which was then s. 193 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, applied to a child legitimated by the subsequent marriage of the parents and refused to follow Bednall v. Bednall & Shivussawa (2), Green v. Green (3), and Jones v. Jones (4). In the course of his judgment, however, the learned judge said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 527):

"The powers conferred by the Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 193, are not confined to children of the marriage, but apply to 'children the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings,' as it is put in one place, or the 'children of the petitioner and respondent,' as it is put in another place. Both those expressions seem to me to make parenthood the test, not legitimacy. The difficulty arises from the cases of Bednall v. Bednall & Shivussawa (2), Green v. Green (3) and Jones v. Jones (4). According to those cases, an order for custody can only be made in respect of legitimate children. It is to be noticed, however, that s. 193 applies not only to proceedings for divorce, but also to proceedings for nullity of marriage; and in Langworthy v. Langworthy (5), a nullity case where there never was a valid marriage, the Court of Appeal held that the section enabled the children of the union to be provided for. That decision was not cited in any of the three cases, and it seems to me to show that the test under s. 193 is parenthood, not legitimacy."

In Langworthy v. Langworthy (5) it was held that the court had jurisdiction to order a provision to be made for the child of the marriage which the court had declared void, because the court was expressly given such jurisdiction, namely, in nullity proceedings, by s. 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. Section 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, as amended by s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, was replaced by s. 193 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which was in its turn replaced by s. 26 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. The phraseology of all three sections is substantially the same.

In Colquitt v. Colquitt (6) LORD MERRIMAN, P., in giving the considered judgment of the Divisional Court to the effect that a legitimated child is a child of the marriage within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, approved the decision of DENNING, J., in M. v. M. (1), but he adversely criticised his statement that parenthood was the test and not legitimacy. That part of the judgment reads as follows ([1947] 2 All E.R. 52):

"In M. v. M. (1) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 528), DENNING, J., placed great reliance on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Langworthy v. Langworthy (5), which is referred to as showing that the test under s. 193 of the Judicature Act, 1925, is 'parenthood not legitimacy.' That case established that a child of the union who is rendered illegitimate by the annulment of the marriage can be dealt with under s. 193, for the very reason, as is pointed out by COTTON and FRY, L.JJ. (11 P.D. 89), that the section expressly refers to nullity proceedings, but in relation to proceedings for divorce, at any rate, we think that to say that parenthood, not legitimacy, is the test, goes too far. It cannot, in our opinion, be suggested that, although the parenthood is undisputed, an illegitimate child who cannot be legitimated is the subject of custody proceedings under s. 193, on the divorce of the spouses who are, in fact, his parents, but we agree with DENNING, J., that the fact that the wording of s. 193 is wide enough to cover the case of a child of the union rendered illegitimate by the annulment of the marriage of his parents, tends to support the view that in divorce proceedings it is also wide enough to include a child who has been rendered legitimate."

Prima facie the term child or children in a statute means legitimate child or children, but a wider meaning may be given, where that meaning is more consonant with the object of the statute: see Fulham Parish v. Woolwich Union (7). Following this decision MACKINNON, J., in Morris v. Britannic Assurance Co., Ltd. (8) held that the term "child" used in the Industrial Insurance Act, 1923, included illegitimate children because the nature of the obligation as to which insurance was desired was the same whether the child was legitimate or illegitimate. In many statutes, which are applicable to children, such as the Unemployment Act, 1934, the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1935, the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1936, the Finance Act, 1936, the Workmen's Compensation (Supplementary Allowances) Act, 1940, and the Pensions (Increase) Act, 1944, there are sections which specifically define the expression "child" as including an illegitimate child, for the purpose of that particular statute. There is no definition of the expression "child" either in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, or in the appropriate Acts which preceded it. I have, therefore, to ask myself, what was the object of the statute.

The preamble to the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, makes it clear that its object was to constitute a court with exclusive jurisdiction in matters matrimonial in England and with authority in certain cases to decree the dissolution of a marriage. The provisions of the Act also give the court jurisdiction in matters ancillary to the dissolution of the marriage, to enable the court to adjust matters as between the parties to the marriage, in the light of its dissolution. The statute is concerned with marriage, and I cannot think that the legislature had anything but the children of the marriage in mind. Both the Legitimacy Act, 1926, and the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, give the legitimated child and the adopted child respectively the status of a child of the marriage, with some exceptions which are immaterial to the question I have to consider. I agree entirely with the view expressed by the Divisional Court in Colquitt v. Colquitt (6), and with what LORD MERRIVALE, P., said ([1929] P. 104) in Green v. Green (3), in referring to s. 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and to s. 193 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, that children in these enactments means legitimate children. I am concerned solely with a claim for legal custody. The wife, already, has the de facto custody, and, so far as maintenance is concerned, the fact that a man marries a woman with a young child, whether he be the father of the child or not, is a matter which the court would take into consideration in awarding the woman maintenance after a dissolution of the marriage, assuming the child was still under age and needing support. For the reasons I have given, this summons must be dismissed.

Summons dismissed.

Animal—"Unlawful and malicious killing"—Defence of property—Dog chasing chickens—Right of poultry-owner to kill—Reasonableness.

A The appellant, who was the owner of a poultry farm, saw a dog belonging to the respondent's stepson chasing his chickens. Although the appellant had a gun at the time he did not fire at the dog, but he warned the respondent that, if again he found the dog worrying the chickens, he would shoot it. On the next day the appellant saw the dog among his chickens and killed it. On his being summoned for unlawfully and maliciously killing the dog, B justices found that, while the appellant acted under considerable provocation, "he did not exhaust every practicable means of stopping the dog from attacking the fowls," and they convicted him.

HELD: the true test to be applied was whether the appellant had acted reasonably in what he did; in the circumstances, he had so acted; and, therefore, the conviction should be quashed.

EDITORIAL NOTE. In Gott v. Measures ([1947] 2 All E.R. 610) LORD GODDARD said: "A person may be justified in shooting a dog if he honestly believes that it is necessary as being the only way in which he can protect his property." Subsequently, Cresswell v. Sirl (infra) was decided by the Court of Appeal. In the present case the latter decision is applied to criminal proceedings D under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, and the test of reasonableness is added to that of necessity. Here the test of reasonableness was applied.

CASE STATED by Wiltshire justices.

On Sept. 21, 1950, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Corsham, an information was preferred by the respondent, Sir William Wrixon Becher, under F s. 41 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, against the appellant, Francis Frederick Goodway, charging him with having unlawfully and maliciously killed a certain dog, the property of Adrian Bridgwater, the respondent's fourteen-years-old stepson. For the appellant it was contended that when he shot the dog it was attacking his fowls, and that, in the circumstances, he acted reasonably in G regarding the shooting as necessary for the protection of the fowls. For the respondent it was contended that a person was not justified in shooting a dog if he knew that less violent measures were available and that the appellant might have taken other steps to safeguard his poultry, e.g., by chasing the dog off the land, or beating it, or requesting the respondent to shut it up. The justices, being of the opinion that, while the appellant acted under considerable provocation, he did not exhaust every practicable means of stopping the dog from H attacking his fowls, convicted him of the offence charged and fined him £2.

Perks for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The appellant and his brother are poultry farmers and own eighty-five acres of land in the parish of Corsham, Wiltshire, adjoining the property of the respondent, Sir William Becher. The respondent's stepson owned a mongrel bitch which on successive days in August, 1950, worried the appellant's fowls. On the first day, when the appellant went to collect the eggs he found that all the eggs had been broken and were on the floor or in the nesting boxes. On the next day the appellant, carrying a gun, saw a black and brown mongrel dog worrying and chasing his fowls. He did not use the gun on that day, which, it seems to me, shows that he was not altogether an unreasonable person, but he complained to the respondent that the dog had been chasing his fowls and that he had seen it go off to the respondent's premises. The appellant told the respondent that if he caught the dog doing it again he would shoot it. On the third day, however, the dog was again chasing the fowls, and the appellant shot and killed it. There is no branch of the common law which requires more urgent amendment than the law relating to animals. There is the old law that one cannot have trespass by the act of a dog, but it has been laid down in recent cases that a person can protect his property from a dog. A

The question is whether, in shooting the dog the appellant was acting reasonably, or unreasonably so that it can be said he was acting maliciously. The evidence was that on this third morning, between nine and half past eleven, the respondent went to look for his dog several times and could not find it. At 9 a.m. that morning a dog was seen chasing the fowls and pulling out their tail feathers. Twenty minutes afterwards the appellant and his brother went to the field and the appellant took a gun with him. He stood on one side of the field in a gap and the brother went to the other side of the field. The brother saw the dog come out of the poultry house where all the eggs had been found broken. He chased the dog and tried to drive it into the fowlhouse to catch it, but he could not do so. If he had driven the dog into the fowlhouse and then shot it different questions might have arisen. That would rather have been pronouncing sentence of death than doing something to protect property. The dog went on chasing the fowls, and, when it got near where the appellant was standing, he fired and killed it. B C D

The justices found that there were other steps that the appellant could have taken, such as those provided by s. 2 of the Dogs Act, 1871, i.e., by complaining to a court of summary jurisdiction and obtaining an order that the dog should be kept under control. There is, however, an old proverb about shutting the door after the steed has been stolen, and, if the appellant had done that, a fortnight or three weeks might have passed before he got his order and meanwhile the dog would probably have destroyed all the fowls. The justices say E

"... that while the defendant acted under considerable provocation, he did not exhaust every practicable means of stopping the dog from attacking his fowls." F

I am far from saying that these are simple cases for justices to deal with and this court never blames justices if they go wrong in law, but I think they approached this case from a wrong point of view. The question is not whether the appellant took every practicable means of stopping the dog, but whether he acted reasonably in what he did. G

The law on this subject has been laid down in Cresswell v. Sirl (1), a decision of the Court of Appeal, which, although it was a civil case, we should follow. SCOTT, L.J. ([1947] 2 All E.R. 733) said of the person who shoots: H

"(2) He has by proof to establish two propositions, but each proposition may be established in either of two ways: Proposition No. 1: That at the time of shooting, the dog was either (a) actually ... attacking the animals in question, or (b) if left at large, would renew the attack so that the animals would be left presently subject to real and imminent danger unless renewal was prevented."

Both of those factors apply in the present case. The dog was actually attacking the fowls and it is obvious that the fowls would be left in imminent danger of further attacks, because the dog had shown by its conduct that it was a fowl worrier.

"Proposition No. 2: That either (a) there was, in fact, no practicable means, other than shooting, of stopping the present attack or preventing such renewal, or (b) that the defendant, having regard to all the circumstances in which he found himself, acted reasonably in regarding the shooting as necessary for the protection of the animals against attack or renewed attack."

- A While, as a general rule, this court always accepts the findings of justices, if it is shown that they have arrived at their conclusion through approaching the facts in a wrong way this court, having all the facts, can say what the justices ought to have found. Here it was wrong for them to find that the appellant did not exhaust every practicable means of stopping the dog, and, therefore, he did not act reasonably. The question was whether the appellant was acting reasonably in doing what he did, and, in my opinion, he did so act. Therefore, in my opinion, this appeal should succeed and the conviction should be quashed.

- B OLIVER, J.: I agree. One of the findings of the justices relied on by counsel for the respondent was that the appellant on the morning in question went out with the fixed intention of shooting the dog. If that means whatever it was doing, there was no evidence which justified such a finding. What I take it that the finding means is that he went out with the intention of shooting the dog if he found it worrying the fowls. Then, however, there would be nothing illegal in doing so. He would be saying in those circumstances: "If this dog is worrying my fowls again, I am going to shoot it."

- C CASSELS, J.: I agree. In my view, the justices came to a wrong conclusion in law. A farmer is entitled to protect his property even against his neighbour's favourite dog. If that dog finds its happiest time in worrying the farmer's fowls, the farmer is entitled to take action. On the occasion of the act by the appellant which led to his conviction, he found the dog committing this destruction for the third time. He had his gun with him and the justices have found that he took out his gun with the intention of shooting the dog. He probably did, but only if he found it worrying and chasing his fowls, and that is exactly what he did find. It was said that he should have fired the gun into the air or applied to a court of summary jurisdiction under the Dogs Act, 1871, s. 2. The suggestion was made in the course of the case that this particular dog was gun-shy. I cannot see any reason for saying that this farmer acted wrongly because he did not wait, while the fowls were being worried and chased, to see what the effect of a gunshot would be on the dog when the gun was aimed into the air. I observe that the justices have also found that the appellant acted under considerable provocation. That is true. They have also found that the appellant did not act reasonably. In my view, all the evidence demonstrated that he did act reasonably, and I agree with the conclusion at which my Lords have arrived.

Contract—Implied term—Shipment of jute from India to Italy—Export permitted only under licence and subject to quota—Contract not expressed to be subject to quota—Conditions governing sellers' ability to perform contract under quota system known to both parties.

APPEAL by the sellers from a decision of the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, SINGLETON and JENKINS, L.JJ.), dated Dec. 6, 1949, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 51, dismissing an appeal from a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated June 23, 1949, whereby he upheld the award of the committee of the London Jute Association, stated in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the court, on four appeals, which were brought before the committee by the buyers, against awards made by arbitrators in favour of the sellers in regard to four separate contracts. The committee of the London Jute Association quashed the awards of the arbitrators and made an award of damages in favour of the buyers, subject to the question of law raised in the Special Case.

The sellers were a partnership carrying on business in Calcutta and dealing, inter alia, in jute. The buyers were a limited liability company, registered in England and carrying on business in London. By the four contracts, two of which were made on July 28, 1947, and the other two on Sept. 5, 1947, the sellers agreed to sell certain quantities of jute, the shipments to be made to Genoa by October, 1948. The contracts were on c.i.f. terms and expressed to be on the terms and conditions of the London Jute Association contract. They were not expressed to be "subject to quota." They were to be construed according to the laws of England and to be deemed to be performed there. At all material times the export of jute from India was prohibited except under licence, both parties being aware of this fact. In February, 1947, the government of India introduced a quota system for regulating the export of jute. Under this system shippers were required to choose as their basic year one of the years from 1937 to 1946, and were allotted a quota in regard to the countries to which they had shipped in their basic year and in proportion to the amount shipped to those countries in that year. The sellers chose 1946 as their basic year, but they had made no shipments to Italy in that year, with the result that no quota was allotted to them for Italy and they were unable during 1947 to make any shipments under the contracts. Under new regulations which were in force for the first six months of 1948 they were allotted a small quantity of jute for shipment to Italy, but by October, 1948, the time fixed for the completion of the contracts, they had shipped less than one-third of the amount which they had contracted to ship. The buyers claimed damages for breaches of the four contracts and the disputes were referred to arbitration. It was contended on behalf of the sellers that an implied term should be read into the contracts that they were subject to the necessary licences and quotas being obtainable, as it must obviously have been the intention of the parties to include such a term to give the transaction the efficacy which both parties had intended it to have.

The Court of Appeal held that the court would read an implied term into a contract only where it was clear that both parties intended that term to operate; that, although both parties knew that the contracts could only be met out of the sellers' quota, the question whether that quota would suffice for the purpose depended on matters concerning the conduct of the sellers' business which were peculiarly within their knowledge as opposed to that of the buyers (e.g., the sellers alone would know (a) which year they had chosen as their basic year and what quota they were likely to receive as a result of their choice, and (b) what contracts with other buyers had to be satisfied out of their quota), and that an unqualified provision to the effect that the contract was subject to the quota being sufficient and to the seller using his best endeavours to obtain a sufficient quota, would be quite inadequate to secure the business efficacy of the contracts; and, therefore, as the parties could not be taken to have intended that the term sought by the sellers to be implied should be incorporated in the contracts, it was impossible to read into the contracts of July and September, 1947, the term contended for by the sellers.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Birkett, L.J.J.), June 18, 19, 20, 1951.]

Estate Duty—Passing—Property deemed to pass—Policy of assurance—Premiums paid by trustees of settlement—Death of assured—Cesser of payment of premiums—Claim on "slice" of capital to produce premiums—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 2 (1) (b), s. 7 (7).

By a deed of appointment and re-settlement, dated Aug. 8, 1935, made between R.B., the life tenant under the original settlement, H.B., the tenant in tail in remainder, and trustees, certain investments and cash were directed to be held by the trustees on trust (i) as regards the cash, to make certain payments and to purchase from R.B. at their surrender value certain policies of assurance on his life, and (ii) as regards investments, to retain or sell the same and re-invest the proceeds and out of the income of the investments and re-investments and the proceeds of the policies (thereinafter called "the trust fund") to pay (inter alia) the premiums and other moneys necessary for keeping on foot certain policies of assurance (including those purchased from R.B.). The balance of the income of the trust fund was to be held on protective trusts for H.B. during his life, and subject thereto the trust fund was to be held on trust for various other persons having successive interests, R.B. being excluded from all beneficial interest. At all times after the date of the re-settlement the premiums in respect of the policies on the life of R.B. were paid by the trustees. On Nov. 14, 1946, R.B. died, and estate duty was claimed under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (b), in respect of the "slice" of the trust fund required to produce the income necessary to pay the premiums on the policies on the life of R.B.

H

HELD: the persons entitled to the trust fund subject to the protected life interest of H.B. had immediately before R.B.'s death a right to have annual sums withdrawn from the income of the trust fund and used in keeping up the policies; such right was an "interest" within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act of 1894, notwithstanding that it did not entitle such persons to immediate beneficial enjoyment of the sums; that interest ceased on the death of R.B.; and, therefore, estate duty was payable under s. 2 (1) (b) calculated on the "slice" of capital ascertained in accordance with s. 7 (7) of the Act of 1894.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This appeal has raised the question whether duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (b), is exigible on the death of one Robert Bingham Brassey, whom I will refer to, as he has been called throughout the case, as Captain Brassey, on Nov. 14, 1946, in the circumstances to be stated.

I propose to go at once to the deed of re-settlement of Aug. 8, 1935, to which the parties were Captain Brassey, of the first part, and his son, Hugo Bulkeley Brassey (whom I will call Hugo, as he has been called during the argument), of the second part, and trustees, of the third part. The re-settlement recited an earlier deed of settlement made in 1897 whereby certain estates known as the Heythrop estates were settled on strict settlement. Shortly before the execution of the deed which I am now summarising, there had been a disentailing deed in the usual form, and the deed of 1935 was made in exercise of the power reserved in the disentailing assurance to Captain Brassey and Hugo jointly to appoint. Exercising that power, they appointed so that Captain Brassey was thereafter excluded from any beneficial interest in the trust premises. The first operative trust was to the effect that the trustees should out of capital make certain payments. One of those consisted in the purchase from Captain Brassey for a named sum of certain policies, which are set out in the first part of the third schedule to the deed. There were four policies, being policies of assurance on the life of Captain Brassey issued by the Clerical, Medical and General Life Assurance Society. The total amount for which the life was insured and which therefore became payable on Captain Brassey's death was £40,000, and the total of the premiums payable in respect of those policies was, to the nearest pound, £1,977 per annum. Reverting to the body of the deed, the trusts then set out were to this effect. The trustees were out of the income of the investments named to pay, as they fell due, the premiums in respect of the four policies. Subject thereto the income of the trust premises was limited on protective trusts during Hugo's life whereby Hugo was the primary beneficiary. Subject to those trusts, the capital was limited in favour of the children and issue of Hugo as he should appoint, subject thereto on trust for the children of Hugo in equal shares, and subject thereto again there was a general testamentary power of appointment conferred on Hugo. There was also a power for Hugo to appoint in favour of a widow. Those trusts exhausted the beneficial limitations in the settlement. In so far, therefore, as those trusts should be inapplicable—for example, if Hugo should die without issue and should not exercise his general testamentary power—the trust premises would then stand limited according to the appropriate trusts under the original settlement of 1897, and under those trusts (in default of any of the trusts of the deed of 1935 coming into operation) Hugo would become tenant in tail of the premises. Subject to that trust, the next limitation would be in favour of the testamentary appointees of Captain Brassey. In default thereof, the next limitation would be in favour of Captain Brassey's daughters, or Hugo's three sisters, respectively as tenants in tail. I need not pursue the matter further.

Before leaving the deed, I should refer to the fact that, by cl. 2 (c), there was a provision that the trustees should not be chargeable or responsible “for any omission or neglect to enforce any covenant thereinbefore contained in relation to any policy for the time being subject to the trusts thereof or to keep up or restore any such policy or effect any new policy pursuant to the provisions thereinbefore contained.”

I have said that Captain Brassey died in 1946, and, as the four policies with the Clerical, Medical and General Life Assurance Society had been maintained, there then fell into the hands of the trustees as part of the trust premises the sum of £40,000, the policy monies. The claim under s. 2 (1) (b) is not, however, a claim to exact duty on that sum. As counsel for the Crown explained, the benefit that arose by receiving the policy monies is, for present purposes, an irrelevant benefit. There is, perhaps, a certain irony in that concession, for counsel have made it clear that the somewhat obscure provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, are apt to work in a rather mysterious way. Observe the facts of the present case. During the period between 1935 and 1946, being the residue of Captain Brassey's life, a sum of £1,977 was yearly diverted from Hugo's enjoyment and employed in the payment of the premiums to the Clerical, Medical and General Life Assurance Society. On the death of Captain Brassey that diversion ceased and the £40,000 was received. But, if the Crown's claim is right, as I have felt constrained to conclude that it is, the duty exigible which arises out of the provisions relating to the policies appears to amount to a sum of £60,000 to £70,000, not less than fifty per cent. more than the capital value of the policies, a result which, by depriving Hugo of £1,977 per annum, the trustees in the due performance of their obligations have managed to achieve. If the trustees had been given prophetic vision, they might have thought with justice that they would have best served the interests of their beneficiaries by consigning the policies to the flames on the day following the execution of the re-settlement and thereafter declining to pay any premiums. As counsel pointed out, they would have run the substantial risk that, if Captain Brassey had not survived this conflagration by three years, they would have been even worse off than they are now, but, given sufficient prophetic vision, they would, in the event, have enabled Hugo to enjoy the £1,977 per annum of which he was deprived and would have succeeded in enriching the trust estate by the sum of about £25,000. I have said all this because such a result seems startling, and, for my own part, I was impressed with the argument which counsel for the trustees put before us that it was a result which the sections could not be said to have contemplated, and that, in particular, there was here a non-fulfilment of the essential condition which s. 2 (1) (b) imposes, viz., that an interest enjoyed by some person ceased on the death of the deceased. But, stating in a sentence my conclusion and the reasons for it, I have felt constrained in light of the decisions of this court in Re Hodson's Settlement (1) and Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. A.-G. (2) to agree with ROMER, J., for the reasons which he gave that the necessary conditions for the application of the section have been fulfilled.

In the course of his judgment, the learned judge put the matter thus ([1951] 1 All E.R. 106):

"Accordingly, if the trustees, in disregard of their trust obligations, had paid the whole of the trust income to Hugo Brassey, there can be no doubt but that the court would, at the instance of the remaindermen, have intervened and compelled them to devote sufficient of the income to the maintenance of the policies. From this it follows, in my judgment, that the remaindermen had pro tanto an 'interest' in the trust income and a corresponding 'interest' in the property, i.e., the trust fund, of which that income was the fruit. I am unable to avoid the conclusion that this was an interest in property within the purview of s. 2 (1) (b), or that that interest ceased on the death of Captain Brassey; and, in my view, the fact that the right was vested in the remaindermen in their capacity of reversioners is of no real materiality. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that it is not permissible to split up the rights of the remaindermen and, by doing so, to identify some immediate interest and isolate it from their title to possession of the property, which was reversionary and nothing else. I cannot, however, accept this contention. The fact that the remaindermen's right to the possession and the enjoyment of the property was and is future does not and cannot alter the further fact that a right to insist on income being applied to premiums (like a right to enforce accumulation, as to which see Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. A.-G. (2)), is a valuable ancillary right which confers an immediate interest in the property from which the income is derived."

Out of respect to the argument of counsel for the trustees, I feel it would not be right for me to leave the matter with a mere affirmation of that conclusion, and I proceed, therefore, to state, I hope briefly, the considerations which have led me to that result, and particularly to make reference to one point which emerged at the end of the argument, namely, the application Aye or No of the case of A.-G. v. Lloyds Bank, Ltd. (3).

By way of premise, I think it necessary for me to read the relevant language of s. 2 (1) (b) and also refer to s. 7 (7). Section 2 provides:

"(1) Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say:— . . . (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest . . ."

If the matter had stopped there, it would appear clearly that the subject-matter to be taxed was the benefit accruing or arising by virtue of the cesser of the previous interest. Section 7, however, enjoins a different method of computation, for it provides:

"(7) The value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased shall . . . (b) if the interest extended to less than the whole income of the property, be the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended."

- That paragraph has been referred to before now as somewhat enigmatic in its language. It has enshrined in the records of cases under this Act what is known as "the slice theory." But, for present purposes, the point to be made is that, though the subject-matter to be taxed is property to the extent to which a benefit arises, that benefit is assessed by looking at the extent of the interest which has ceased. Where, as here, the interest stated to have ceased is an interest in a certain part of the income of the trust estate, then one is to treat as the subject-matter to be taxed, being the value of the benefit accruing or arising, a proportion of the whole trust premises rateably equivalent to the proportion which the sum of income in question bears to the total income. It is in that way that the apparently startling result is achieved that, though these premiums produced a sum of £40,000, the amount of them represented a share of total income which is expressed, when the same proportion of capital is calculated, by a figure of £104,000 or £105,000. If the conditions are satisfied, that result seems inevitable. Counsel for the Crown, indeed, said that, if attempt is made to create limited interests of this character in trust premises, inevitably and as an arithmetical certainty there arises a claim for duty on a capital sum which is far greater in value than the limited interest which is created. Whether that is arithmetically true, and whether, if true, it is just, I cannot say, and it is unnecessary for me to try to determine the problem. But that such results may emerge is now perhaps painfully apparent. From what I have read it is of the essence of the matter, as counsel for the Crown conceded, that two conditions must be satisfied: (i) an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, and (ii) a benefit accruing or arising by the cesser of the interest.

- I have already indicated that, if the matter had been free from authority, which, I think, binds this court, I might have felt inclined or disposed to say that the sort of interest which is defined in this case as so ceasing was not within the intendment of s. 2 (1) (b), and, perhaps, I should have derived some comfort from the passages in LORD MACNAGHTEN'S speech in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4) ([1899] A.C. 210), to which counsel for the trustees alluded. For the interest here is not a right to enjoy actual income paid to some person. Such a case is not uncommon and falls within s. 2 (1) (b)—for example, where a testator or settlor provides for the payment of an annuity, say £100 a year, during a life. When the life drops, the interest of the annuitant ceases because he then ceases to enjoy that £100 per annum. Here the only persons who had the privilege of receiving sums year by year from the trustees were the Clerical, Medical and General Life Assurance Society. All are agreed that they should be disregarded under s. 2 (1) (b) for any purpose. One has to find some beneficial interest under the settlement. The way it has been formulated is—I borrow the language of junior counsel for the Crown—that if one finds that some person or persons has or have the right to have some sum of income withdrawn or diverted from the person who would otherwise be entitled to receive it and applied for purposes from which they will ultimately derive a benefit, then that person or those persons has or have an interest within the meaning of the language of s. 2 (1) (b).

- I have stated the relevant limitations under the settlement, and it is apparent that during the remainder of Captain Brassey's life there was a class of persons, for whose benefit this provision in the instrument was inserted, who had a right to have the £1,977, so to say, withdrawn from trust circulation and put into the building-up of these policies. They were numerous. They consisted of all those persons for whose benefit eventually the capital of the trust might be held—Hugo's issue and children, Hugo's general testamentary appointees, Hugo's widow, Hugo himself as tenant in tail, Captain Brassey's general appointees, Hugo's three sisters as tenants in tail respectively under the Heythrop settlement. At all material dates Hugo was unmarried. He had, therefore, no issue at the date of the death of Captain Brassey, and immediately before and immediately afterwards. So, of this numerous class of persons interested many were non-existent. But, as counsel for the Crown observed, and I think rightly, since there are some persons in existence within that class, viz., Hugo's sisters, it is impossible to say, if in other respects the argument is good, that there were no persons having such a right as I have tried to define, namely, the right to have these annual sums so diverted and applied.

There still remains the question whether the interest, defined as junior counsel for the Crown defined it, is such an interest as s. 2 (1) (b) contemplates. Counsel for the trustees argued that the only interest contemplated by the section was an interest of the nature of a beneficial enjoyment of some sum of income or some other property, whereas here it is merely a right to enforce the trust. It is at that point, as it seems to me, that the two cases in this court to which I have already referred are relevant, and indeed, as I think, compelling. They were both cases which related to trusts for accumulation. I should, I think, be taking up time unduly if I referred at length to the facts of those cases. It is sufficient to say that in both cases there was a trust for accumulation either of the whole of the income of the settled fund or of the whole less some fixed sum payable to an annuitant, and after the death of the settlor there were trusts whereby certain persons, children and more remote issue of named individuals, became entitled in succession to limited interests and to the capital of the funds, including the accumulated funds. I hope I have stated sufficiently the essential feature of those cases. There was this difference. In Hodson's case (1), which was decided first, the claim arose only as regards the application of s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, to the accumulated fund, but in the second case, the Westminster Bank case (2), the claim, also under s. 1, related to the whole capital of the trust premises, including the accumulated fund. But, for present purposes, that distinction is immaterial. I have said that both were claims under s. 1, and to that point I shall return in a moment. In Re Hodson's Settlement (1), the judgment of the court was, as it was in the Westminster Bank case (2), delivered by CLAUSON, L.J. He dealt exhaustively with a number of decisions (including the Lloyds Bank case (3)) and he examined closely the structure of s. 1 of the Act and the necessary conditions to its application. He quoted the celebrated passage from the speech of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in A.-G. v. Milne (5) that the expression "passing on the death" used in s. 1 of the Act is to denote some actual change in title or to possession of the property as a whole. He went on ([1939] 1 All E.R. 202):

"In the present case, the property as a whole is the accumulations fund, and it would appear prima facie that, applying the words of LORD PARKER, it is not open to this court to hold otherwise than that on Mr. Hodson's death the accumulations fund passed. Up to the death, the income was subject to a trust for accumulation for the ultimate benefit of the lady and her children. Upon the death, this trust ceased, and the lady became thenceforward for the rest of her life the sole beneficiary in the income of the fund. It is true that before the death the lady had an interest of a contingent character in the income of the fund, since she had a right to have it accumulated so as to provide a fund the fruit of which would, if she survived Mr. Hodson, come to her, but this circumstance would not prevent the change in the beneficial possession of the property as a whole which took place on Mr. Hodson's death from operating as a 'passing' of the property on his death."

After an examination of the authorities which I have already mentioned, he concluded (ibid., 208):

"In our judgment, this court is bound, in view of the later authorities, to hold that the view taken by this court in A.-G. v. Lloyds Bank, Ltd. (3) of the principles to be applied in such cases as the present must now be A recognised to have been deficient, in that it failed to bring out the crucial point that, in order to arrive at a correct decision, attention must be focussed upon a comparison between the persons beneficially interested in the fund the moment before the relevant death and the persons so interested the moment after the death, and upon the question whether the death effected an alteration in rights, as distinguished from merely removing the possibility of an alteration. Accordingly, if the persons beneficially interested are the same both before and after the death, and if the death merely removes the possibility of an alteration of their rights, as was, in the view of the House of Lords, the case in A.-G. v. Lloyds Bank, Ltd. (3), there is no passing; whereas in the present case, while the beneficiaries are, no doubt, the same before and after the death, but the death brings to an end one set of trusts of income and shifts the beneficial interest in the income to the possession of one who (though no doubt previously a contingent beneficiary) had no beneficial interest in possession before the death, there is a 'passing' within s. 1 of the Act."

B

To those references I add one further citation—and it is of vital importance—from the Westminster Bank case (2). There, as I have said, the facts differed for the present purpose only in that the whole fund and not merely the accumulated fund was in question. The learned judge said ([1939] 2 All E.R. 73):

C

"In our judgment, the reasons which led us to hold that the accumulations fund in Re Hodson's Settlement (1), passed under Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, on the settlor's death must lead to the same conclusion as regards the originally settled funds and the accumulations fund in question in this case, setting aside for the moment any question as regards the policies. Previous to their mother's death, the children of Mrs. Van der Goes had an interest in the income of these funds, since they had a right to have that income accumulated so as to provide an accumulated fund the fruit of which would come to them, and the children of those children had a corresponding right to have it accumulated so as to provide an accumulated fund the capital of which would, in default of appointment to the contrary, come to them."

E

In the light of those references, it seems to me that, unless there is some distinction between s. 1 in this regard and s. 2 (1) (b), it is not open for this court to say other than that the class of persons whom I have stated represented, so to speak, by the three Hugo sisters, had immediately before Captain Brassey's death the right to have these annual sums withdrawn and paid in keeping up the policies, and that such a right is "an interest" within the language of the section under consideration. I have already read that part of the judgment of ROMER, J., where he founded his conclusion on the assertion of that proposition. Since the result of keeping up these policies has turned out financially so disastrous, one cannot avoid wondering whether any court would have enforced any such right. But, as I have already said, the disaster would have been even blacker if the policies were abandoned, unless Captain Brassey survived the abandonment for three years. I think, therefore, that it cannot for that reason be said that this right is one which no court would have enforced and, therefore, can be disregarded for the purposes in question, and the provision in cl. 2 (c) of the re-settlement cannot, in my judgment, produce that result. If, then, the interest is of the character I have named, I cannot satisfactorily formulate or discern any distinction in principle between a provision to accumulate during the settlor's life so much per annum out of income by investing in the ordinary way, on the one hand, and a provision to keep up policies which will mature on the death of the settlor, on the other hand. In principle, the operation seems to me to be the same—a provision for building-up a fund of capital which will become part of the trust premises for all purposes on the settlor's death.

H

I am still passing over the question whether there is some difference between s. 1 and s. 2 (1) (b) in this regard in order that I may complete what I think to be the consequences which necessarily flow from what I have so far said. I have said that that interest which I have defined ceased on the death of Captain Brassey. What, then, was the benefit which accrued or arose? I think it was the circumstance that this £1,977 no longer was withdrawn from what I have called trust circulation, but became immediately available for the enjoyment of the person entitled, under the protective trusts, to the income of the trust premises. It follows, therefore, that the benefit accruing or arising must be valued in the manner stipulated by s. 7 (7), and you arrive arithmetically—on this there has been no question raised before us—at the figure which I have already stated of £105,000.

I add a word or two about the Lloyds Bank case (3), to which counsel for the trustees referred, though, perhaps, I have anticipated what can be said about it by my citation from the judgment of CLAUSON, L.J., in Re Hodson (1). If it could be said that before and after the relevant date the person or persons—if there were more than one—interested under the settlement were the same (and their respective interests, if they were more than one, were also the same), then I think it may necessarily follow from the Lloyds Bank case (3) that any passing, actual or notional, for the purposes of estate duty would be negatived. But it does not seem to me that those conditions can be found in the present case. Before Captain Brassey's death there was a number of persons interested under the settlement. Their various successive interests I have already attempted to state. After the death many of them were the same persons, though their interests were not entirely the same. In addition, other interests had arisen. In the first place, there was the widow of Captain Brassey, who became entitled to a jointure of £3,000 per annum out of income. Further, by his will Captain Brassey in fact exercised his general power of appointment so that his three daughters, Hugo's three sisters, ceased to have an interest as tenants in tail respectively under the Heythrop settlement and became on the failure of prior limitations between them absolutely entitled by virtue of the appointment. Therefore, there was no such identity of persons and interests as, I think, would make the Lloyds Bank case (3) applicable so as to defeat the Crown's claim here.

I now turn to what is the last point to which I would like to refer. As counsel for the trustees pointed out, both the Hodson case (1) and the Westminster Bank case (2) arose under s. 1—i.e., in both cases the question was one of the passing of property, using that word in the sense in which LORD PARKER defined it in the quotation from his speech to which I have referred. In this case it is one of notional passing. It is true that the particular language which we have to construe here appears in para. (b) of s. 2 (1) and there is no corresponding language in s. 1, but, to my mind, that does not affect the result, namely, that what CLAUSON, L.J., said in giving the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Re Hodson's Settlement (1) and Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. A.-G. (2) is equally applicable when this para. (b) has to be considered. It would, indeed, be curious if it were otherwise. Counsel quoted the reference in LORD MACNAGHTEN's speech in the Cowley case (4) to the effect that s. 2 is designed, putting it broadly, to bring within the actual grasp of the Act cases which were within the spirit, though they fell outside the precise language, of s. 1. Consider for a moment such a case as is illustrated by the present case, but where there is not a specific sum to be laid aside each year in the way of accumulations, but the whole of the income less an annuity; or take what is, perhaps, a simpler example, the case where what is directed to be accumulated is not £X per annum out of the income, but a fraction of the total income, say one-tenth out of a total income of say £1,000 per annum. In such a case as that it would appear to follow from the decision in the Westminster Bank case (2) that a corresponding portion of the trust fund would pass. It would seem to me to be strange if, instead of providing that one-tenth of the income should be accumulated, one said that £100 a year, which is in effect the same thing, should be accumulated, the result would be that there would be neither an actual nor a notional passing under s. 1 or s. 2. In both types of case the effect of s. 1 and s. 2, I think, is to say that you must treat as "passing" the requisite portion of the fund, the income of which has been applied in that particular way of accumulation.

- A Reverting to the formula I have already used, a certain sum of income has been withdrawn in order to build up a fund for the benefit of those entitled in the future. It seems to me that when the general scheme of the Act is regarded, there is no real basis for supposing that something which is regarded as an interest for the purpose of determining whether there has been a passing, or something which precisely corresponded to it, should not be regarded as "an interest" within s. 2 (1) (b) for the purposes of a notional passing. As I have already pointed out, in order that there may be a passing, quoting from CLAUSON, L.J., there must be a real change in the title to or the possession of the trust premises, the property passing. You achieve such a result if you say that before the relevant death there was an "interest" different from that which followed it, which former interest ceased at the death. If that is so, I find it impossible to say that rights which can be properly, and must be held in this court to be properly, described as an interest which ceases so as to give rise to a passing cannot be properly regarded as an interest within the meaning of the language of s. 2 (1) (b). I find it impossible to say that the fact that Hodson's case (1) and the Westminster Bank case (2) are s. 1 cases renders inapplicable and not binding on this court the conclusions which I think necessarily flow from the language which I have quoted, particularly in the Westminster Bank case (2), from the judgment of CLAUSON, L.J. For these reasons, I have come to the conclusion—I have felt compelled to come to the conclusion—that this appeal fails. However erratic, as has been apparent in this respect, may be the actual working of the terms of the Act, and however financially disastrous has proved to be the due performance of their duties by the trustees under the trust, I see no escape from holding that the duty claimed is properly exigible.

JENKINS, L.J.: For the reasons stated by the learned judge and by the Master of the Rolls, to which I cannot usefully add anything, I agree that the claim made in this case for duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (b), is well-founded, and, accordingly, that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

F BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

By his will, made on Jan. 15, 1948, the testator gave his residuary estate to his trustees on trust to pay the income thereof to a niece during her lifetime, and after her death to hold both capital and income on trust for his great-niece on her attaining the age of twenty-five or marrying, with an ultimate gift over. The testator held £200 ordinary stock of a company whose interests included passenger road transport and road haulage undertakings. During the testator's lifetime these interests were acquired from the company by the British Transport Commission for the sum of £24,800,000, which was satisfied by an allotment to the company of British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock at 101 per cent., the interest on the purchase price accruing as from Jan. 1, 1948, and the profits from the transport interest passing to the commission from that date. On Feb. 21, 1949, notice was sent to the testator of an extraordinary general meeting of the company to be held on Mar. 17, 1949, to consider an ordinary resolution to pay a special capital profits dividend on its ordinary stock by distributing to each stockholder on the register on Feb. 21, 1949, £5 British Transport stock for each £1 of the company's ordinary stock held by him. On Feb. 27 the testator died. At the meeting of the company on Mar. 17 the resolution with regard to the special profits dividend was passed, and on Apr. 1 the dividend was paid. As a result, the trustees of the testator's estate received £1,000 British Transport stock, and the question to be determined was whether it was to be treated as capital or income of the estate.

HELD: as the dividend was paid in respect of a transaction completed before the testator died and was made payable in respect of a date during his lifetime, even though it was not actually paid until after his death, what was received should be regarded as income which accrued due before his death and, accordingly, formed an asset of his estate before his death, and, therefore, the sum of British Transport stock was to be regarded as capital of the testator's residuary estate for the purposes of the will.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Arthur Wellesley Winder and in the events which had happened, a sum of £1,000 British Transport stock received by the trustees of the will as capital profits dividend on £200 ordinary stock of Thomas Tilling, Ltd., which formed part of the testator's residuary estate, was to be treated as capital or income for the purposes of the trusts of the will.

Templeman for an infant contingently entitled in remainder.

A

ROMER, J.: This summons raises a question which arises out of the fact that the testator possessed as an item of his property a sum of £200 of the ordinary stock of Thomas Tilling, Ltd., and the question is whether £1,000 British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock which the trustees of his will received after his death by virtue of that holding is to be treated as capital or as income of his estate.

B

By his will, which he made on Jan. 15, 1948, the testator gave his residuary estate to his trustees on trust to pay the income thereof to the first defendant, Mrs. Fausset, during her life, with remainder to the second defendant, Miss Heather Fausset (Mrs. Fausset's daughter, who is now nineteen), contingently on her attaining the age of twenty-five or marrying. On Nov. 8, 1948, a statement was issued by the chairman of Thomas Tilling, Ltd., to the stockholders, informing them:

"An agreement with the British Transport Commission for the acquisition by the commission of the company's interests in passenger road transport and road haulage undertakings affected by [the Transport Act, 1947], following the provisional agreement announced in the Press, has now been completed. The consideration for the transfer is £24,800,000 to be satisfied by an allotment of British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock 1968-73 at 101 per cent., the Stock Exchange price on Sept. 30 last. Interest at the rate of three per cent. per annum on the purchase price accrues as from Jan. 1, 1948, and the profits from the transport interest from that date will pass to the commission."

Later in the statement, after setting out which of the company's interests were transferred to the commission and which were retained by the company, he said:

"It is proposed to recommend at a meeting to be convened later that on Apr. 1, 1949, a capital distribution be made out of the amount received to holders of ordinary stock at the rate of £5 of British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock 1968-73 in respect of each £1 stock held. Interest on this stock up to that date will be received by the company."

F

On Feb. 21 the stock of Thomas Tilling, Ltd. was quoted for the first time ex dividend. On the same day notices convening a meeting to be held on Mar. 17 were sent out to the stockholders, accompanied by a circular letter signed by the secretary. That letter said:

G

"The business of this extraordinary general meeting will be to consider, and if thought fit to pass ordinary and special resolutions in connection with, the following matters . . ."

In reference to the ordinary resolution, which was described as a resolution relating to the special profits dividend, the letter said:

H

"This provides for the proposed capital distribution referred to in the statement by the chairman, Sir Frederick Heaton, dated Nov. 8, 1948, on the agreement with the British Transport Commission. In the event of the resolution being passed each ordinary stockholder on the register on Feb. 21, 1949, will receive £5 (nominal) British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock 1968-73 for each £1 ordinary stock of the company held. This British Transport stock will be distributed as at Apr. 1 next, interest on such stock up to that date being received by the company."

It also said that there would be sent to each ordinary stockholder of the company on the register on Feb. 21, 1949, a form of acceptance in respect of the British Transport stock to which he would become entitled. The actual resolution in regard to the special profits dividend was in the following form:

"That a special capital profits dividend on the ordinary stock of the company of £20,806,000 payable out of the profit realised by the company on the recent sale of part of its undertaking to the British Transport Commission be and the same is hereby declared and that such dividend be payable to the ordinary stockholders on the register on Feb. 21, 1949, in proportion to their holdings of ordinary stock and be paid and satisfied by the distribution amongst them as at Apr. 1, 1949, of £20,600,000 British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock 1968-73 (part of the consideration received by the company from the British Transport Commission for the sale above referred to) taken at its issue price of 101 per cent."

That letter and the notices were sent out on Feb. 21, 1949, and six days later, on Feb. 27, 1949, the testator died. On Mar. 17, 1949, a meeting of the company was held. The ordinary resolution with regard to the dividend was passed and on Apr. 1, 1949, it was paid. As a result of it, the trustees of the testator's estate received £1,000 of British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock, and they desire to be told whether they ought to retain it as capital of the testator's estate or distribute it as income.

The relevant terms of the will are as follows. After appointing the plaintiffs as executors and trustees and making a number of pecuniary bequests and specific bequests and devises, the testator, by cl. 7, gave "all my estate whatsoever and wheresoever" to the trustees on trust, first, to raise a sum thereout to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and the legacies given by him, and then:

"(ii) To retain the residue of my property (hereinafter called 'my residuary estate') in its existing state of investment at my death. (iii) To pay the income of my residuary estate to my said niece Naomi Mary Fausset [the first defendant] during her life without power to anticipate the same during coverture. (iv) From and after the death of my said niece to stand possessed of my residuary estate (both capital and income) for [the second defendant] provided she shall attain the age of twenty-five years or marry under that age ..."

with certain trusts in her favour of the income of the residuary estate in the meantime, and then there is an ultimate gift over to certain charities. By cl. 8 he says:

"I direct that for the purpose of simplifying the administration of my estate the bank shall from time to time at their absolute discretion have the following additional powers ..."

Then follow certain administrative powers, and, finally, under cl. 8 (d):

"To treat all rents dividends and other periodical payments received after my death as income it being my intention that as between capital and income of my estate there shall be no apportionment in respect of accruing income payments."

It appears that the testator's gross estate was a large one, valued for the purpose of estate duty at £101,000 odd, and his holding of £200 ordinary stock in Thomas Tilling, Ltd., was valued at his death at £262 10s., based on the then market price of 26s. 3d. ex dividend per £1 unit of stock. The estate duty attributable to that holding, which had to be and was paid, amounted to £80 15s. 2d.

The question in general terms whether this capital profits dividend should be treated as income or as capital has been the subject of more than one application to the court, and, so far as I am aware, the first time it came up for consideration was in Re Sechiari (1), which came before me and in which, having regard to certain principles which had been laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Hill (R. A.) v. Permanent Trustee Co. of New South Wales, Ltd. (2), I arrived at the conclusion that the dividend should be regarded and treated, not as capital, but as income. I inserted into the order a protective provision to enable the parties, if so advised, to resort to any equitable jurisdiction which there might exist for apportioning the dividends as between capital and income, that being a jurisdiction which, as VAISEY, J., observed in Re Kleinwort's Settlement (3), might be exercised if special circumstances were to be established. I am not concerned with that equitable jurisdiction today, the only question with which I am now concerned being whether the principles which led me to decide Re Sechiari (1) in the way which I did decide it lead to a similar conclusion on the present application.

Counsel for the first defendant, the tenant for life, contends that Re Sechiari (1) and the principles in Hill's case (2) apply to the present case. He says that the fact that the resolution, as a result of which this dividend was paid, was that payment should be made to members who were on the register of Thomas Tilling, Ltd. on Feb. 21 is quite irrelevant, as the crucial date is the date of the declaration of the dividend, there being no right vested in a member to anything until that date arrives and the declaration is passed, and the resolution does not even purport to make the dividend payable retrospectively to Feb. 21 but merely, as between the company and the recipient, fixes the recipient, for convenience sake, by reference to that date. He says then, and rightly, that, even if the company had purported to alter the persons who were to take beneficial interests under the testator's will, it could not do it, because it is not what the company does in a matter of this kind which determines matters as between tenant for life and remaindermen, but it is what the settlor does when he establishes the settlement. He submits that, as the resolution was passed some time after the testator's death and the dividend itself was not received until even later, the mere fact that it is issued by reference to the register on Feb. 21, when the testator was alive, does not prevent it from being income payable to the tenant for life in accordance with the decision in Re Sechiari (1).

I think, so far as they go, I should accept those propositions, but what I have to decide is whether or not, on the true construction of the testator's will and in the events which have happened, the tenant for life is entitled to the dividend. If she is entitled to it, she can only, as I see, be entitled to it if it can properly be described as "income of the testator's residuary estate," for that is all that is given to her under the will. Neither counsel for the tenant for life, nor counsel for the infant beneficiary, was disposed to rely on cl. 8 of the will, although at first sight it might be thought to have some bearing on the matter. They said (and I am disposed to think that they are right) that it was not directed to a matter of this kind, but was introduced merely for convenience in administration in regard to accruing income payments.

The only question, which is a simple one to state, but not so simple to answer, is: Can the British Transport stock fairly be regarded as income of the residuary estate? It appears to me that counsel for the infant beneficiary is right when he says that the distribution was made payable in respect of a date or period during the testator's lifetime, although it was not actually paid until after the testator's death, and, accordingly, that what is received must be regarded as income which accrued due before the testator's death and is, accordingly, capital. He referred me to Re Muirhead (4), where a dividend paid after the death of the tenant for life, but in respect of a period which had determined before her death, was held to be payable wholly to the estate of the deceased life tenant. Similarly, he says, it is perfectly plain from the statements which appear in the circulars and resolutions relevant to the matter that this stock was paid in respect of a transaction which had been completed before the testator died.

The persons to receive the stock were to be determined on a date before the testator's death, namely, Feb. 21. The resolution says that the dividend is to be paid out of the profits realised on the recent sale of assets, and, in the second paragraph of the chairman's statement, it is stated that interest accrues from Jan. 1, 1948, from which it is to be fairly reasonably inferred that that was the date of purchase. Counsel for the second defendant went on to say that, as the result of the decision in Re Muirhead (4), when the right to the dividend arises by the resolution, one looks to the period in respect of which it is paid. Finally, he said, and I think rightly, that at the testator's death the right to the dividend, if and when it was passed (and everybody seemed to have taken it for granted that the resolution would be passed), was a separate asset of his estate. It was quoted ex dividend and would be treated for the purposes of duty, presumably, as a separate asset, attracting duty as such, and the date of the actual declaration had nothing to do with the matter.

That was certainly the position at the time of the testator's death. If he sold his £200 stock, he would sell it ex dividend in the absence of a special bargain. Later on he would receive a separate asset, which at that time existed in the form of a contingent or future right to an asset. That formed part of his property, just as much as other items of the estate formed part of his property, and it seems to me, in those circumstances and taking all the dates and other relevant considerations into account, that it is quite impossible to say that this guaranteed stock is income of the residuary estate. It formed an asset of the estate before his death and, therefore, to my mind, it cannot be said to form part of the income of the residuary estate after his death. On that ground it seems to me that the case is altogether removed from the area which was covered by Re Sechiari (1) and the principles which I applied in Re Sechiari (1). Counsel for the tenant for life tried to displace the view which I have formed by reference to Re Jowitt (5), which was a decision that, in the case of a payment by a company to its shareholders out of revenue, the Apportionment Act, 1870, applies only if the payment is made or declared in respect of a definite period, and he says that no special period exists in relation to the declaration of this dividend, but I do not think that is material for consideration. If I come to the conclusion, as I do, that the right to this payment crystallised prior to the testator's death, then it seems to me that that must necessarily lead to the conclusion that, when the payment was received, it could not form part of the income of his residuary trust fund but formed part of his capital estate for the purposes of cl. 7 of his will. Accordingly, I propose to declare, in answer to the question raised in the summons, that on the true construction of the will and in the events which have happened the £1,000 guaranteed stock which the trustees received by way of capital profits dividend ought to be treated as capital for the purposes of the trusts of the will.

Declaration accordingly.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ., and Hilbery, Lynskey and Devlin, JJ.), June 12, 13, 25, 26, 1951.]

Emergency Legislation—National registration—Identity card—Right of police to require production—National Registration Act, 1939 (c. 91), s. 6 (4).

A The appellant was convicted by justices of failing to produce his national registration identity card to the respondent, a police officer in uniform, when required to do so, contrary to s. 6 (4) of the National Registration Act, 1939, and was discharged absolutely under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 7 (1).
 B On appeal he contended that the Act of 1939 was no longer in force because it was provided by s. 12 (4) that it should continue "... until such date as His Majesty may by Order in Council declare to be the date on which the emergency that was the occasion of the passing of this Act came to an end ..." and that several orders (which terminated other Emergency Acts) contained declarations to that effect, the first having been made on Feb. 19, 1946.

C HELD (SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., and DEVLIN, J., dubitantes): on the true construction of s. 12 (4) it was contemplated that to bring any of the Emergency Acts to an end there must be an Order in Council dealing with the particular Act; there was no such order terminating the National Registration Act; and, therefore, the Act was still in force and the appellant was rightly convicted.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices.

F At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Hornsey an information was preferred by the respondent, a police officer, alleging that the appellant failed to produce his national registration identity card when required to do so by the respondent, contrary to s. 6 (4) of the National Registration Act, 1939. At the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted. While the appellant was driving a motor vehicle he was stopped by the respondent, who was in uniform. The respondent requested the appellant to produce to him his national registration identity card, but the appellant refused to do so. The respondent told the G appellant that he would issue to him a form to produce his identity card at any police station, and the appellant replied: "I will not produce it at any police station and I will not accept the form." The respondent gave the form to the appellant who threw it on the pavement, from which another police constable picked it up and placed it in the appellant's motor vehicle. The appellant did not produce his identity card within the prescribed period.

H It was contended for the appellant that by s. 12 (4) the National Registration Act, 1939, was to "continue in force until such date as His Majesty may by Order in Council declare to be the date on which the emergency that was the occasion of the passing of this Act, came to an end;"

that, by the Courts (Emergency Powers) (End of Emergency) Order, 1950, it was declared that Oct. 8, 1950, was the date on which the emergency which was the occasion of the passing of the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, came to an end; that the emergency which was the occasion of the passing of both Acts, was the same; and that, therefore, the right of a police constable in uniform to request the production of a national registration identity card no longer existed, because the statute creating that right had ceased to be in force on Oct. 8, 1950. The justices were of the opinion that no Order in Council or other enactment had been passed repealing s. 6 (4) of the National Registration Act, 1939; that under reg. 20AB of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927, as amended), para. (4) of that regulation was substituted for s. 6 (4) of the National Registration Act, 1939; that para. (4) repeated the relevant provisions of s. 6 (4); and that pursuant to the Emergency Laws (Continuance) Order, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1770), reg. 20AB was to continue in force for a further period of one year until Dec. 10, 1951, unless previously revoked. The justices, therefore, convicted the appellant, but they discharged him absolutely under s. 7 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948.

The appeal was first heard on June 12 and 13, 1951, before LORD GODDARD, C.J., LYNSEY and DEVLIN, JJ., and it was then adjourned to be heard before a specially constituted court, and to give the Attorney-General an opportunity to appear as amicus curiae. At the adjourned hearing it was contended for the appellant that all the Emergency Acts which were passed at the outbreak of the war and which used a formula similar to that in s. 12 (4) of the National Registration Act, 1939, came to an end on Feb. 19, 1946, which His Majesty by Order in Council declared to be the date on which the emergency that was the occasion of the passing of the Regional Commissioners Act, 1939, the first Act so to be dealt with, came to an end.

The Attorney-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.) and J. P. Ashworth appeared as amici curiae.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The judgment I am about to pronounce is the judgment of myself, SOMERVELL, L.J., JENKINS, L.J., HILBERY, J., and LYNSEY, J. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The question we have to decide is whether the National Registration Act, 1939, is any longer in force. The question is one of very great public importance, and that is sufficiently indicated by the fact that this court of seven judges has been specially constituted to deal with the matter. The Act was passed on Sept. 5, 1939, two days after the outbreak of the war. It provides for people being registered and giving certain particulars. The Act and regulations made thereunder provide for the production of an identity card to police officers in uniform on demand by them, and a penalty for refusing to do so is prescribed. Section 12 (4) provides:

“ This Act shall continue in force until such date as His Majesty may by Order in Council declare to be the date on which the emergency that was the occasion of the passing of this Act came to an end, and shall then expire except as respects things previously done or omitted to be done.”

In the opinion, I think, of all the members of the court, the question raised is essentially one of construction. It was argued for the appellant that there was only one emergency which, in respect of other Acts passed at or about the same time as this Act and in which the same formula is used, has been declared by various Orders in Council to be at an end, and, accordingly, that the emergency which occasioned the passing of this Act must be deemed to be ended at the time when the first of those Orders in Council came into force. On the other hand, it was argued that there can be different aspects of the same emergency, and that, if the Crown considered that a particular aspect no longer existed, so that the emergency which occasioned that particular Act to be passed was ended, it would not follow that all the Acts dealing with other aspects of the same emergency were terminated. In my opinion, and that of the judges who agree with me on this point, the latter argument is correct, and on the true construction of this formula, used in so many of the Acts passed at the outbreak of war, it is contemplated that to bring any one of those Acts to an end there must be an Order in Council dealing with that particular Act. It follows that Orders in Council are required to terminate each of the Acts in which this formula is used, and may do so on different dates. Accordingly, in our opinion, this Act has not been terminated by reason of the first Order in Council which was passed so long ago as Feb. 19, 1946—the Regional Commissioners Act (Expiry) Order, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 164)—and, as there is no Order in Council terminating the National Registration Act, 1939, we cannot say that the Act has been terminated.

Before I part with the matter I should like to say two things. First, I think the justices should be congratulated on the fact that their decision has been upheld by a court specially constituted to hear this appeal. Secondly, the court wishes to express its emphatic approval of the way the justices dealt with this case by granting an absolute discharge for, although the police may have powers, it does not follow that they ought to exercise them on all occasions or as a matter of routine. From what we have been told by counsel for the respondent it is obvious that the police now, as a matter of routine, demand the production of national registration identity cards whenever they stop or interrogate a motorist for whatever cause. Of course, if they are looking for a stolen car or have reason to believe that a particular motorist is engaged in committing a crime, that is one thing, but to demand a national registration identity card from all and sundry, for instance, from a lady who may leave her car outside a shop longer than she should, or some trivial matter of that sort, is wholly unreasonable. This Act was passed for security purposes, and not for the purposes for which, apparently, it is now sought to be used. To use Acts of Parliament, passed for particular purposes during war, in times when the war is past, except that technically a state of war exists, tends to turn law-abiding subjects into law-breakers, which is a most undesirable state of affairs. Further, in this country we have always prided ourselves on the good feeling that exists between the police and the public and such action tends to make the people resentful of the acts of the police and inclines them to obstruct the police instead of to assist them. For those reasons I hope that, if a similar case comes before any other bench of justices, they will deal with the case as did the Hornsey bench and grant an absolute discharge. In the Road Traffic Acts, 1930 and 1934, Parliament dealt with the matter of endorsements on licences and so forth, and, if the police do not think that those Acts give them sufficient powers or think that the administration of those Acts is difficult, they can go to Parliament and ask for further powers. They ought not to use a security Act, which was passed for a particular purpose, as they have done in this case. For these reasons, although the court dismisses the appeal, it gives no costs against the appellant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: Although I do not dissent from the conclusion my Lord has expressed I think that, having regard to the importance of the case and the arguments delivered, it is right that I should briefly state the difficulties that I have felt in concurring with the judgment which has been delivered.

For my part, when regard is had to the measures which appeared on the statute book between the end of August and the middle of September, 1939, I feel great difficulty in accepting the view that Parliament intended to deal with these matters on the footing that there were numerous and distinct emergencies, and I feel equal difficulty in accepting the proposition that, though there was but one emergency, Parliament intended to deal distinctly with several manifestations of it. That, however, is not, in my judgment, the end of the matter, for, as my Lord has said, there falls to be considered a point of construction which may be briefly stated thus: whether what has been called the "usual formula" which is found in these Acts means that any particular Act ceases to operate at the time stated by a declaration by His Majesty in Council following a particular form and referable to the particular Act whatever may be the extraneous circumstances, or whether the formula, as counsel for the appellant has contended, is merely a periphrastic statement of the words "the present emergency." I confess that on that point, if the matter rested with me alone, I should feel a strong inclination towards the latter view. I have placed some reliance in this respect on the language of the first of the Acts, the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and on the circumstance that there was available, and there was used by Parliament, a formula which would have exactly expressed the intention of Parliament if the former view had been intended.

But, for reasons which I can very briefly state, I do not think the matter entirely rests with that point of construction. Having regard to the view taken by the majority of the court it would be impertinent to assert that the matter of construction was not one which was (within the language of LORD STERNDALE, M.R., in Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), in the passage cited in Re MacManaway (2) ([1951] A.C. 177)) "fairly and equally open to divers meanings . . ." If that be so, then there would, as it seems to me, be strong ground at least for saying that reference could be had to later legislation, and that reference seems plainly to indicate that Parliament thereafter consistently thought that the meaning of the earlier Acts had been that for which the Attorney-General has contended. I have further been deterred from expressing any final conclusion on the point of construction by the further consideration that, if the view for which counsel for the appellant has contended be right, I am far from satisfied that the conclusion would not rightly be that none of the Orders in Council so far made and purporting to put an end to particular Acts has had any effect at all, on the ground, as the Attorney-General stated, that they would have been made alio intuitu. For these reasons I propose to say no more than to give expression to the difficulties I have felt. But with regard to that part of the judgment my Lord has delivered dealing with the exercise of the police powers as distinct from their existence I would like to express my emphatic affirmation.

DEVLIN, J.: I share the doubts which have been expressed by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., on the construction of this statute, and I entertain also doubts on other points that were discussed in the course of the argument. In ordinary circumstances I should have taken time to resolve them, but as this is a point of great importance on which it is desirable that a speedy decision should be given, and as the majority of the court has reached a clear conclusion on it, I think that no public advantage would be served by any elaboration of the doubts at present in my mind. I also wish to say, in relation to the concluding observations of LORD GODDARD, C.J., that I entirely agree with them. I think it would be very unfortunate if the public were to receive the impression that the continuance of the state of emergency had become a sort of statutory fiction which was used as a means of prolonging legislation initiated in different circumstances and for different purposes.

Appeal dismissed.

STUDHOLME v. MINISTER OF FUEL AND POWER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Birkett, L.JJ.), June 14, 15, 18, 1951.]

Gas—Nationalisation—Compensation—Unquoted securities—Assessment of value—Relevant date—Effect of impending nationalisation—Relevancy of agreement as to value of other securities—Gas Act, 1948 (c. 67), s. 25 (2), s. 25 (10).

- A The applicant was the stockholders' representative appointed under s. 27 (1) of the Gas Act, 1948, to represent the interest of the holders of securities of a nationalised gas company in connection with the determination of the amount of compensation payable in respect of those securities. The securities were not quoted on the Stock Exchange and their value had to be determined in accordance with the provisions of s. 25 (10) of the Act.
- B It was agreed between the Minister of Fuel and Power and the applicant that the value of the company's ordinary stock was £121 per cent., but there was no evidence showing how that figure was arrived at. The parties failed to reach agreement on the value of three other classes of securities and the applicant applied to the Gas Arbitration Tribunal for a determination of their value. The tribunal decided that the value of the securities should be assessed by reference to the value of comparable securities as determined by s. 25 (2) and not by reference to their values on May 1, 1949, i.e., the vesting date. Being dissatisfied with the tribunal's determination, the applicant appealed by way of a Special Case in which the tribunal set out the following questions for the opinion of the court (i) whether the values for compensation of the securities in question were to be assessed on May 1, 1949; (ii) whether the values were to be assessed on the basis that the gas industry was about to be nationalised; and (iii) whether the fact that the value for the company's ordinary stock had been agreed was a "relevant factor" within the meaning of s. 25 (10).

E HELD: (i) on the true construction of s. 25 (10) of the Act of 1948, the value of the securities had to be determined by reference to the matters specified in s. 25 (2) and the value on the vesting date was, therefore, irrelevant.

(ii) since the basis of valuation prescribed by s. 25 (10) related the matter back to a period before the depressing effect of nationalisation had made itself felt, no special allowance should be made for the effect of nationalisation.

F

(iii) since there was no evidence as to how the value of the company's ordinary stock was arrived at, that was not a "relevant factor" within s. 25 (10) and should not be taken into account.

G FOR THE GAS ACT, 1948, s. 25 (2) and s. 25 (10), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 892 and 894.

SPECIAL CASE stated by the Gas Arbitration Tribunal under the Gas Act, 1948, s. 64 (3).

H The applicant, who was the stockholders' representative of the Dudley Brierley Hill and District Gas Co., applied to the tribunal for the determination of the values of the five per cent. consolidated preference stock, four per cent. perpetual debenture stock, and 4½ per cent. perpetual debenture stock of the company. By a decision dated Nov. 11, 1950, the tribunal made an award in alternative form, first, in the form of a Special Case, and, secondly, in the form of a final and conclusive decision subject to the opinion of the Court of Appeal on the points of law raised in the Case. For the applicant it was contended (i) that the relevant date for the valuation of the securities under s. 25 (10) of the Gas Act, 1948, was May 1, 1949, the date on which the property of the company vested in the West Midland Area Gas Board; (ii) that between 1945 and the vesting date the threat of nationalisation consequent on the result of the general election in 1945, depressed the prices of the company's securities and comparable securities, and that this was a relevant factor within the meaning of s. 25 (10), to which the tribunal should have regard, and that the values for compensation should be the value which the securities would have had on the vesting date, but for the impending nationalisation of the gas industry; (iii) that the fact that the applicant and the Minister had agreed a figure of £121 per £100 of stock as the compensation value of the company's consolidated ordinary stock under s. 25 (10) of the Act was a relevant factor to be taken into account in determining the value of the company's other securities under the same sub-section. The tribunal decided that the value of the securities within s. 25 (10) must be assessed primarily by reference to the value of comparable securities as determined by s. 25 (2) and not by reference to their value on the vesting date, and that sub-s. (10) required the tribunal to take into account other factors if satisfied that they were relevant, but that the agreement on the value of the company's ordinary stock was not a relevant factor within the meaning of sub-s. (10).

Mocatta, K.C., and Templeman for the applicant.

Upjohn, K.C., J. P. Ashworth and R. J. Parker for the Minister of Fuel and Power.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: This is an appeal, the first of its kind, by way of Special Case stated by the Gas Arbitration Tribunal pursuant to s. 64 (3) of the Gas Act, 1948. The tribunal was appointed with the object of determining the values, for the purposes of s. 25 (1) of the Act, of certain securities. The securities in question are five per cent. consolidated preference stock, four per cent. perpetual debenture stock, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. perpetual debenture stock of the formerly existing Dudley Brierley Hill and District Gas Co. Pursuant to the Act, the applicant, Mr. Richard Home Studholme, has been duly appointed stockholders' representative, and has, therefore, been concerned on behalf of the stocks he represents to argue certain points with a view to increasing the compensation payable in respect of these stocks, amounting to £82,275, £2,500, and £9,500, respectively.

The purpose of the Gas Act, 1948, was, to quote from the preamble of the Act,

"... to provide for the establishment of area gas boards and a Gas Council, and for the exercise and performance by those boards and that council of functions relating to the supply of gas and coke and certain other matters; for the transfer to such boards as aforesaid and to the said council of property, rights, obligations and liabilities of gas undertakers and other persons; for co-ordinating the activities of area gas boards and the National Coal Board relating to carbonisation; to amend the law relating to the supply of gas; to make certain consequential provision as to income tax; and for purposes connected with the matters aforesaid."

The object of the Act was to nationalise the gas industry in England, Wales and Scotland. For that purpose provision was made, among other things, for the acquisition of the various gas undertakings, of which the Dudley Brierley Hill and District Gas Co. was one. That particular company falls within the description contained in s. 15 (1) (a) of the Act and within the definition in s. 15 (2) (a) as a "statutory undertaker"—that is "every person who carries on a gas undertaking authorised by any enactment." In s. 15 (1) (b) reference is made to

"every person who carries on a gas undertaking not authorised by any enactment but providing supplies of gas the whole or main part of which was, during the year 1947, consumed by persons other than the undertaker, any subsidiary or holding company of the undertaker, and any subsidiary of a holding company of the undertaker."

Such person is referred to in sub-s. (2) (b) as a "non-statutory undertaker." There are other types of gas undertakers, including an ancillary gas undertaker, where the person concerned is also comprised within sub-s. (2) (b), but where the gas is not the whole or main part of his business. For the purposes of the acquisition process, a vesting date is referred to in s. 17 (1) of the Act, which, by the Gas (Vesting Date) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 392) has been fixed as May 1, 1949. On that date the undertaking of the particular statutory undertaker with which we are concerned vested in the West Midland Area Board. The problem concerns the ascertainment of the amount of compensation which was to be payable in respect of the various stocks of this particular undertaker which I have described. In addition to the preference and debenture stocks, there was also an issue of ordinary stock, and that fact will have a significance to be presently noticed.

Section 25 (1) provides:

"Every holder of securities of any undertaker to whom this Part of this Act applies . . . shall be entitled to be compensated by the issue to him by the Gas Council, in accordance with the provisions of sched. II to this Act, of British gas stock of such amount as in the opinion of the Treasury is at the vesting date of a value equal to the value of the said securities held by him, regard being had (in estimating the value of the stock so issued) to the market value of government securities at or about the vesting date . . ."

That sub-section admittedly means that whatever be the value of the securities held by the stockholder, and however that value be ascertained, he will receive by way of compensation, not a sum of cash, but an amount of British gas stock which will be of a value equivalent to the value of the stocks of the holder on May 1, 1949. That date relates to the value of the British Gas Council's stock when transferred. By way of illustration, let it be supposed that the value of the securities held by a particular holder is ascertained, in accordance with the other provisions which are applicable, to be £98. The amount of gas stock which that holder is entitled to receive is such an amount of British gas stock as on May 1, 1949, shall be worth £98. If the value of British gas stock is £98, for every £100 on that date he will, therefore, receive £100 nominal of British gas stock. It will be observed from what I have said that the question at what date, if at any particular date, the securities to be compensated are valued, has not been stated. Counsel for the applicant has said that, if the matter stood merely in accordance with the provisions of sub-s. (1), it would follow as a matter of ordinary sense that that value would also be ascertained at the same date, being the date that the transaction of transfer is to take place. I think that, if there were nothing more relevant to the question than is found in that sub-section, it may well be that the answer counsel suggests would be correct. The remainder of the first ten sub-sections of s. 25, however, deal with the way in which one does arrive at the value of the securities of the particular holder. Sub-section (2) provides:

"Where securities of any class were quoted in the Stock Exchange Official Daily List on all six of the following dates [i.e., Oct. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 20, 1947], and were also quoted in the said list or in the Stock Exchange Daily Supplementary List on any of the following dates [i.e., Feb. 15, Mar. 15, Apr. 16, May 15, June 15, and July 16, 1945] the value of securities of that class for the purposes of this section shall, subject to the provisions of this section and the next following section, be deemed to be either—(a) the average of the mean of the quotations for securities of that class appearing in the said Stock Exchange Official Daily List on the said dates in the year 1947, or (b) the average of the mean of the quotations for securities of that class appearing in the said Stock Exchange Official Daily List or the said Stock Exchange Daily Supplementary List on the said dates in the year 1945 on which a quotation therefor so appeared, whichever is the higher . . ."

Plainly the effect of those provisions in the case of the "quoted securities" is twofold. First, the value is to be arrived at by looking at dates on which it may be said the securities were unaffected either by the immediate prospect of nationalisation—i.e., in 1947—or by the more distant picture of nationalisation—i.e., in 1945. The point of taking those dates is, clearly, that the existence of pending nationalisation had an effect, which was perceptible on the Stock Exchange, on the value of these types of security. In fact, they fell during the period from October, 1947, until the vesting date, whereas other industrial securities during the same period rose. That phenomenon is described, no doubt, accurately, by counsel for the applicant as being “the depressing effect” of the proposed gas nationalisation. From that particular depression, therefore, this method of arriving at the value was designed to protect the stockholders. The second effect of the provisions was to give an option to the stockholders to take whichever was the better of the two figures, one determined by reference to 1947 figures and the other determined by reference to 1945 figures.

Sub-section (3) deals with a special class of case, namely, the case of securities falling within sub-s. (2), but where there has been a fresh issue of securities of the particular class after the last relevant quotation. In such a case the sub-section provides:

“... the value ... shall be deemed to be the average of the values of all the securities of that class calculated on the basis that—(a) the value of each of the securities comprised in that issue is the price at which it was issued, and (b) the value of the remaining securities is the value which those securities had or would have had for the purposes of this section immediately before the issue took place.”

The effect of that sub-section is to fix the price of these new issues by reference to a calculation which, so far as the old part of the issues was concerned, is to be determined in accordance with these “pre-depression” dates of quotation. Sub-section (4) deals with cases where the stocks have been converted into securities of “a different nominal value.” The sub-section adheres to the main plan which is discernible in what I have read, namely, the fixing of the value of these securities by reference to dates prior to the date when the pendency of the Gas Act would be likely to affect the value one way or the other. Sub-section (5) relates to issues of a new class after Oct. 20, 1947. The value of such securities is to be deemed to be the issue price. Sub-section (6) states that the preceding sub-sections (2), (3) and (5) do not apply to securities issued after Dec. 31, 1945, “on terms and conditions approved by the Minister” for specific purposes, and the value of such securities shall again be deemed to be the issue price. Sub-section (7) deals with cases where under the last two preceding sub-sections the securities have been disposed of by public auction or tender. In such a case the price is deemed to be (a) where the holder of the securities is the person who originally acquired them, or his successor, not being a purchaser for value, the price which he originally paid for them, and (b) in any other case, the average gross price arrived at as indicated previously. Sub-section (9) provides:

“If any question arises under any of the last seven preceding sub-sections as to the value of any securities, it shall be settled by agreement between the Minister and the stockholders’ representative appointed under the following provisions of this Part of this Act, or, in default of such agreement, determined by arbitration under this Act.”

Counsel for the applicant stated that the catena of sub-sections which I have read has in it the possible hiatus that securities issued after Dec. 31, 1945, without the consent of the Minister, but before Oct. 20, 1947, would be covered neither by sub-s. (5) nor sub-s. (6). His reason for making that point will appear shortly.

So far, the provisions of the section have dealt exclusively with “quoted securities.” Sub-section (10), the sub-section particularly in question, deals with other securities than quoted securities. It provides:

“For the purposes of this section, the value of any securities, not being securities to which sub-s. (2), (3), (4), (5) or (6) of this section applies, shall be such value as may be agreed between the Minister and the said stockholders' representative or, in default of such agreement, as may be determined by arbitration under this Act, and the arbitration tribunal, in determining the value of those securities, shall have regard to all relevant factors including, as far as may be, the value of securities to which sub-s. (2) of this section applies (as determined under that sub-section), being securities which, as respects all matters affecting their value, are most nearly comparable to the first mentioned securities, and if, in relation to any class of securities to which this sub-section applies, such a fresh issue or conversion of securities as is mentioned in sub-s. (3) or sub-s. (4) of this section has occurred, the arbitration tribunal shall also have regard, as far as may be, to the manner in which the value of securities is to be determined in cases to which the said sub-s. (3) or sub-s. (4) applies."

It is under that sub-section that the various securities including the ordinary stock of the Dudley company fell to be ascertained. So far as the ordinary stock is concerned, agreement was reached between the Minister and the stockholders' representative, on a value of £121 per cent., but, as regards the other three types of stock, no agreement was found possible, and the matter, accordingly, came before the arbitration tribunal.

No question arises, if any of the methods of calculation for which counsel for the applicant has contended be the correct ones, of impossibility of arriving at the resultant figure, because in each case the tribunal did arrive at a figure which would be appropriate on the various hypotheses stated. Subject to this court's determining to the contrary, however, the tribunal decided that the real values for the three classes of stock which I have mentioned were, per £100 of stock, £115 in the case of the preference stock, £102 15s. in the case of the four per cent. debenture stock, and £113 10s. in respect of the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. debenture stock. The tribunal found as a fact that in the case of the preference stock and the four per cent. debenture stock there were certain stocks which fell within the description of securities "most nearly comparable" to the particular security in question, and they took the figure that would be appropriate for those comparable stocks in accordance with the provisions of sub-s. (2) as their guide, but they appear to have made some slight addition to the values at which they thus arrived. There was no stock which the tribunal thought "most nearly comparable" to the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. debenture stock of this undertaker other than the four per cent. stock of the same company, and, therefore, the figure at which they arrived in respect of the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. stock was in a sense arrived at by proceeding from their conclusion on the four per cent. stock to their conclusion on the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. stock. It follows that the basis of the tribunal's valuation in each case was a figure arrived at, not in relation to the vesting date, but in relation to the earlier 1947 or 1945 dates, and they rejected the argument which had been put forward on behalf of the applicant that in the case of non-quoted securities—that is a case falling under sub-s. (10)—the right date on which to arrive at a value was the vesting date. I have already stated that between 1947 and the vesting date stocks of this character declined, whereas other industrial stocks generally rose, the rise being capable of expression by saying that there was a four to six point rise in such stocks. From this, it is said, it may be assumed that, had it not been for the shadow of this impending legislation, gas stocks would also have risen from four to six points between 1947 and 1949.

In approaching this problem, there has been some play made of the use which is found in the Special Case of the adjectives "real" and "artificial." Counsel for the applicant has been accused of applying an artificial value as distinct from a real one. He has rejoined that the adjective "real" has no better applicability to the method of the Minister of Fuel and Power than his own method. I wish to avoid in this matter the bandying of words, and I shall try to avoid suggesting that the words "real" and "artificial" have any particular importance in determining the question in issue. From what I have said, however, it will be seen that, if the value of these securities is to be ascertained, not by reference to some 1947 or 1945 figure, but by reference to a figure at the vesting date, counsel for the applicant is faced with a serious difficulty in that the value, in fact, went on declining, and the price of gas stocks on May 1, 1949, was lower than it was in 1945 or 1947. To avoid that, for him, unsatisfactory result, counsel has claimed that according to the true reading of sub-s. (10) the tribunal, in making its valuation, must exclude any effects that the Gas Act had on these later securities. It is because of that submission that he has been accused of using an "artificial" value.

The precise questions which are formulated by the tribunal are three in number, but, for the reasons which I have just stated, numbers one and two must be taken together. They are these:

"(i) whether the values for compensation of the Dudley securities under s. 25 of the Gas Act, 1948, are to be assessed on May 1, 1949; (ii) whether the values for compensation of the Dudley securities under s. 25 of the Gas Act, 1948, are to be assessed on the basis that the gas industry was not about to be nationalised; (iii) whether the fact that the respondent had determined by agreement with the applicant under s. 25 (10) of the Act a value for compensation of £121 per cent. for the consolidated ordinary stock of the company is a relevant factor within the meaning of s. 25 (10) of the Act."

I propose to deal with those three questions in reverse order. First, then, I consider whether the agreement between the applicant and the Minister of £121 for the ordinary stock is a relevant factor in considering particularly the value of the preference stock. The tribunal stated that they regarded it as irrelevant, and, in my judgment, they were right so to do. As they stated:

"No evidence was given to us showing how the figure of £121 was arrived at, the circumstances in which the agreement was made, or the considerations which prompted it."

They go on to state one fact which was before them, viz., that the ordinary stock during the last sixty-eight years paid regularly a dividend at five per cent., i.e., the same dividend as the preference stock was entitled to receive, and it further appears that by statute they were unable to receive a higher figure. Counsel for the applicant submits that it is absurd, if the ordinary stock (which can be treated for this purpose as a fixed five per cent. stock), is valued at £121, that the five per cent. preference stock, which had priority over the ordinary stock, should be of a value, not greater, but less by the difference between £121 per cent. and £115 per cent. He says that that shows that there must be something wrong with the method of calculation. I am not for a moment suggesting that, in arriving at the figure of £121 per cent. for ordinary stock, the Minister was so persuaded by the arguments of the applicant that he did not properly apply the provisions of sub-s. (10), or otherwise was extravagant in his price. I assume that it was arrived at by a proper application of the principles to be applied. As the Special Case states, however, no evidence was given how it was arrived at or as to the circumstances or the considerations relevant to it. For all we know, or the tribunal knew, there may have been special circumstances which attached this particular price quite properly to the ordinary stock. Unless all the facts were known which bear on the arriving at the £121 per cent. per £100 of stock, it must, in my judgment, be right to say that it is not a relevant factor, and, indeed, it would be liable to be a most misleading factor if it were taken into account. I am unable to accept the view that, because of the one circumstance limiting the dividend on the ordinary stock which I have already stated, that must be necessarily reflected in the price of the preference stock. Counsel for the applicant will, I hope, forgive me if I say no more about it than that. For the reasons which they themselves state, the tribunal is plainly right in regarding as irrelevant the fact that this price had been agreed between the Minister and the stockholders' representative.

I now come to the more difficult problem of the first two questions. I have stated that I will deal with them in reverse order not only because unless counsel for the applicant succeeds on his second point the first is worse than useless to him, but because I think the consideration of the second point assists in arriving at the proper conclusion of the meaning of sub-s. (10) not only in relation to this point but in relation to the first point. I approach the construction of this sub-section as a matter of English with the view that where one talks of "relevant factors" one is referring to facts as they are, or circumstances as they are, which may have a bearing on the problem to be solved. No doubt, the pendency of the passing of the Gas Act was a factor which would have a bearing on the values, and, in so far as it did, it had, in fact, the effect of reducing their value. If it was intended to exclude from consideration some matter of fact which was there and which plainly did affect the subject-matter under consideration, I should most certainly expect that Parliament would deliberately and expressly so provide, as, indeed, it frequently does. Examples were given to us by counsel for the Minister by reference to other legislation: e.g., under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 13 (4), where the formula was that, in arriving at particular values, the person or body charged with the calculation was to proceed as if "this Act had not been passed." It is a common formula in legislation. Indeed, and—which seems to me of great significance—it is to be found in this very Act of 1948 where it is appropriate. In s. 31 (1), for example, provision is made for compensation to ancillary gas undertakers and others, those being persons the definition of whom I have already stated. In the case of ancillary gas undertakings not being bodies corporate, provision is made that compensation is to be arrived at by valuing the undertaking and seeing what it would have been expected to realise if it had been sold on the vesting date in the open market by a willing seller to a willing purchaser. The hypothesis of a willing vendor or a willing purchaser is in conflict, of course, with the actual facts of the case, because, so far from there being a willing sale, the effect of the Gas Act, 1948, was to acquire compulsorily the undertaking. Therefore, in this section, dealing with the valuation of this type of asset, one finds that the formula I have mentioned is used as follows:

"... such amount as the gas undertaking of the undertaker might have been expected to realise if ... (c) this Act had not been passed."

Another instance of the same type of provision is in s. 26 (1). That provides for the case of gas undertakings which have suffered various kinds of war damage so that the value of their securities may fairly be said to have been affected adversely by the war damage they have suffered. In such a case provision is made for compensating the holder by offsetting the depreciation due or attributable to the war damage. The formula there used is

"... the Minister shall direct that the values of those securities for the purposes of the last preceding section shall be increased by such amount as may be agreed between him and the stockholders' representative to be necessary to offset the said depreciation [in the securities]."

The same conception is found also in s. 26 (4). It is, therefore, clear that the framers of this Act had in mind that, in certain circumstances, it would be necessary to make provision in order that the depreciation in the values due to war damage, or, in certain circumstances, to the pendency of the passing of the Act, would have to be offset. When we look at s. 25 (10), however, there is no hint of any such notion as a relevant factor to be taken into account by the tribunal in arriving at the value of the securities concerned. Therefore, if this were the only point, I would feel compelled to say that there is no basis, in the language of this sub-section, for saying that there was to be any such offsetting operation in arriving at the value of the securities with which we are concerned.

The matter, however, has been argued also on the question, at what date should these values be taken? I think the question "at what date" is really an irrelevant one. One is arriving at the value by a particular process and one is not called on, so far as I understand and interpret the language, to do that at any particular or specific date. The question being: How much is £100 nominal of the Dudley company's preference stock to be treated as worth for the purposes of the acquisition of the undertaking?, the sub-section provides how the tribunal shall arrive at that figure, viz., by having regard to all the relevant factors, and then come the important words "including, as far as may be, the value of securities to which sub-s. (2) of this section applies (as determined under that sub-section), being securities which, as respects all matters affecting their value, are most nearly comparable to the first mentioned securities . . ."

Something has been said about the precise significance to be given to the words "as far as may be." I find it unnecessary to say whether their effect is equivalent to "primarily." It is sufficient to say that one of the relevant factors, and the only one in point of fact specified, is the value of what are called, in short, "comparable securities." That is an abbreviation which, I think, does less than justice to the point. It does not suppose that one will find, necessarily, securities which are strictly comparable, that is to say, really similar. What one has to do is to find what securities there are of the quoted stocks which are "most nearly comparable," and to see what the value of those securities is, determined by reference to the dates and the methods specified in sub-s. (2). It seems to me, as a matter of English, plain enough that, if the price of the quoted securities most nearly comparable, valued in the way specified in sub-s. (2), is a relevant circumstance, then that negatives the notion that, in the case of unquoted securities, you are starting from that terminus to arrive at a value on the vesting date in May, 1949. It appears to me that that would have been a most circumlocutory, almost a deceptive, way to arrive at the conclusion, if that were Parliament's intention.

It is, I think, proper to approach a problem of this kind by assuming that the persons who are to receive compensation will be compensated broadly on the same basis whether their securities happen to have been quoted on all the relevant dates or whether the securities the stockholder holds happen not to have been quoted. It would be a capricious and unjust result if the holder of securities in the Dudley company, which happened not to have been quoted securities, was to receive compensation for the depressing effect of the pending gas nationalisation, but the holder of some other stocks, such as the Bristol or Tottenham companies (for they were looked on by the tribunal as comparable) were not to receive any such compensation, particularly where the difference was, as has been shown to be the case here, as much as four to six points. I do not want it to be thought that I am interpreting the minds of the legislators in 1948 by reference to something which happened afterwards, and which nobody could then have known. I take it that it was regarded as exceedingly probable that the effect of the pending legislation would be to depress these stocks. Whether, however, it depressed or elevated them, the point is the same, namely, that it would be surprising if some different treatment were meted out to a holder of stocks which were not quoted from that which was given to a holder of stock which was quoted. Counsel for the applicant has sought, at any rate in part, to meet that argument by saying that sub-s. (10), on the basis of the interpretation he has so far tried to state, is not universal, and that there might be stocks of an undertaker company of a non-quoted variety as to which no other stocks could be found which fell within the description "most nearly comparable." I have already referred to one instance which counsel's ingenuity extracted from a comparison of the terms of sub-s. (5) and sub-s. (6). Counsel also gave as an instance stock in respect of which the particular enactment permitted a payment of ten per cent. dividend. He told us that that was something so unusual that he could not find any other stock like it, yet it did exist. I will assume in counsel's favour (though I must not be taken as necessarily accepting it) that there may be cases in which the particular stock is so much sui generis that the tribunal, A when seeking for the most comparable stock, would give up the pursuit as hopeless and say that there was nothing that is in the least comparable. What in such circumstances would be the method they would adopt is, fortunately, a matter which we are not called on to decide, but, in fairness to counsel's argument, I could not pass it over entirely in silence. I ventured to suggest in the course of argument that any such stocks might be so unlike anything B liable to be affected by market symptoms that the question of difference in value between 1945 and 1949 might be purely academic. It may be that a case might arise in which the tribunal would have to arrive at a figure which was not tied to the 1945 or 1947 figures, yet by a proper application of the language of the sub-section. It would be an unusual case—so unusual that I think that it could not be treated as constituting any discrimination between that type of C stockholder and stockholders of the more usual type. Assuming all that I have said in counsel's favour, however, I still find the language of sub-s. (10) too compelling to enable me to say that one must so construe it as necessarily to be of universal application, and that the only way one can achieve that result is to arrive by a very tortuous and steep climb at May 1, 1949, as the date to which the valuation relates, the more particularly since in the course of this ascent D one would have to go up the last few steps with one eye closed, so as to exclude from consideration the most obvious feature which the view would present, namely, the passing of the Gas Act, 1948. Certainly for what seems to me clearly was regarded in the contemplation of the draftsman of this sub-section as the ordinary case, the route adopted by the Gas Arbitration Tribunal was the correct method, the method laid down by Parliament. I, therefore, would answer E questions one and two, as I have answered question three, in the negative. I think the Gas Arbitration Tribunal rightly arrived at their result.

I think it would be very dangerous and wrong if this court now attempted to make a complete and exhaustive category of the particular factors which, in any given case, the tribunal ought to take into account. It is plain that the discovery of the most nearly comparable stock or securities may well require F other matters to be taken into account. Though the securities chosen may be the most nearly comparable, there may be circumstances which in truth distinguish them in certain respects, circumstances relating for example to the modernity or antiquity of the plant owned and the area supplied and matters of that kind, which would cause the tribunal to qualify by addition or subtraction the figure they first derive from the most nearly comparable stock. All that the G tribunal here seems to me to have done. They have considered all those matters as appears from their own statement of the case. In para. (m) of the Case Stated the tribunal said:

H “ We have been supplied with a list of the dealings in the Dudley five per cent. consolidated preference stock for the years 1937-49. The list showed that during that period there were fifty-two separate transfers covering in all £19,023 of stock. Of those transfers, twenty-nine took place after July 26, 1945, and these covered in all £13,249 of stock. We agree that those dealings are a relevant factor in estimating the value for compensation of the said preference stock. After scrutiny of this list we find that there is only one dealing, namely, a small parcel of £350 of stock for which £120 for £100 of stock was paid on Apr. 28, 1947, that exceeds the amount of £115 offered [by the Minister].”

The question was raised: Is it legitimate, and, if so, how, to have regard to particular dealings, and, especially, to the one referred to as occurring on Apr. 28, 1947, where the price paid was £120. If it is legitimate, have the tribunal drawn the proper, or, indeed, any conclusions from it? In my judgment, that paragraph is free from criticism. I think what the tribunal was saying was this. "We have found the figure of £115 to be the right figure for the preference stock based on the most comparable securities after consideration of other relevant factors and some very slight adjustment as a consequence. We have looked through these dealings to see whether the prices actually paid indicate that there is anything wrong with the figure that we have arrived at in that way, and we think there is not because we find that, with one exception, the actual prices paid were not above, but the same as or below, the figure which we have taken. The one particular instance we have mentioned is of so small an amount that it may be disregarded as not having any real bearing on the point. It was correct for them to have considered these transactions as a check, and, although it was negative, the conclusion that they drew from that examination was the correct conclusion. For the reasons I have stated, I think that the questions posed for the determination of this court should all be answered in the negative, and the appeal fails.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. I find it impossible to dissent from the passage of the Special Case in which the tribunal answers the relevant question of construction in these terms:

"Subject to the opinion of the Court of Appeal we find and decide that on the true construction of s. 25 (10) of the Act the values of securities within that sub-section (and, in particular, the values of the Dudley securities) must be assessed primarily by reference to the values of the comparable securities as determined by s. 25 (2) and not by reference to their values on May 1, 1949. The words 'shall have regard to all relevant factors' in sub-s. (10) do, however, require us to take into account other factors if we are satisfied that they are relevant."

Once this construction of sub-s. (10) is accepted, it necessarily follows that the first and second questions raised by the Case must be answered in the negative. The contention that May 1, 1949, should be taken as the date of valuation is expressly rejected, and the contention that allowance should be made for the depressing effect of impending nationalisation must also fail, because the basis of valuation prescribed by sub-s. (10) relates the matter back to a period before the depressing effect of nationalisation had made itself felt, that is to say, the date or dates in 1945 by reference to which the values of the comparable securities were fixed. Further, I entirely agree with the view expressed by the tribunal that, even if the effect of impending nationalisation had not been excluded by the date to which the sub-s. (10) valuation is related, it could not have been a relevant factor to be taken into account for this purpose. As my Lord has said, the hypothesis that the Gas Act, 1948, had not been passed and that there was not going to be any nationalisation is not a "factor" in any ordinary sense of the word. I agree that there is no justification whatever on the language of the section to import into the calculation the hypothetical assumption suggested. As regards the agreement reached as to the value of the ordinary shares, I entirely agree that on the evidence before the tribunal, it could not be regarded as a relevant factor. Accordingly, I agree with the result stated by my Lord.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

BURTON AND ANOTHER v. HOLDSWORTH.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Jenkins and Birkett, L.JJ.), June 22, 1951.]

Legal Aid—Remittance of action in tort to county court unless security given by plaintiff for defendant's costs—Legal aid certificate issued to plaintiff—Jurisdiction to remit action—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 46 (1), (2).

A In an action for damages for negligence the defendant applied to the court under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 46 (1), to transfer the action to the county court in default of the plaintiffs giving security for his costs. His application was supported by an affidavit showing that the plaintiffs had no visible means of paying his costs should they be unsuccessful. The plaintiffs contended that the court had no jurisdiction to transfer the action under s. 46 (2) of the Act of 1934, as one of the plaintiffs had been granted a legal aid certificate under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.

B HELD: the right given to a defendant by s. 46 of the Act of 1934 was one which, particularly in view of s. 1 (7) (b) of the Act of 1949, could not be taken away by the Act of 1949 or the regulations made thereunder unless some provision in the Act or the regulations either expressly or by necessary implication had that effect, and, as there was no such provision, the exercise of the discretion of the court under s. 46 (2) of the Act of 1934 was not precluded by the fact that a legal aid certificate under the Act of 1949 had been granted to one of the plaintiffs.

F INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiffs in an action for damages for negligence from an order of STREATFEILD, J., dated May 11, 1951, and reported ante, p. 148, allowing an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Master LAWRENCE, dated Apr. 16, 1951, whereby the master refused to make an order under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 46 (2), that, unless the plaintiffs gave security for the defendant's costs, the action should be transferred to the Ilford County Court.

G The master held that, as one of the plaintiffs had received a legal aid certificate under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, he was precluded by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) from making an order under s. 46 (2) of the Act of 1934. STREATFEILD, J., held that Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) did not govern the case of a statutory right to the transfer of an action to the county court in default of security for costs, as distinct from a right to such security by itself, which s. 46 of the Act of 1934 did not confer; that the exercise of the discretion of the court under s. 46 (2) was not precluded by the fact that a legal aid certificate had been issued to one of the plaintiffs; and that, in the circumstances of the case, the discretion should be exercised in the defendant's favour. The facts appear in the judgment of JENKINS, L.J.

Craske for the plaintiffs.

N. Lawson for the defendant.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of STREATFEILD, J., allowing an appeal from an order of Master LAWRENCE refusing an application by the defendant in the action, under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 46 (1), to have the action transferred to a county court on the ground of the impecuniosity of the plaintiffs. The case is one of some general interest and importance inasmuch as it raises a question as to the effect of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, on the power of a court or a judge to make an order of transfer under s. 46 (2) of the County Courts Act. The question is, in brief, whether the circumstance that a plaintiff has become an assisted person under the Act of 1949 ousts the jurisdiction of the court to make an order of transfer.

To appreciate the point in issue it is necessary to state briefly, the facts, and to refer, also briefly, to the main relevant provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, as well as to s. 46 of the County Courts Act, 1934. The action is for damages for personal injuries and is brought by two brothers as plaintiffs, William Ronald Burton and Leslie Glenfield Burton. They sustained injuries when riding a motor bicycle of the plaintiff, William, which came into collision with the defendant's motor lorry, the collision being allegedly caused by the defendant's negligence. The learned master refused to make the order under s. 46 of the Act of 1934 applied for by the defendant on the ground that, in his view, he had no power to make it once the plaintiffs, or one of them, had become an assisted person. The position as to that was as follows. On the matter originally coming before Master BAKER, he was informed of the fact that an application had been made by the plaintiff, William, to be admitted as an assisted person. There was then an adjournment. By the time the matter came on again, this time before Master LAWRENCE, William had been granted a certificate for legal aid. Leslie, the other plaintiff, had not yet obtained a certificate, but it is conceded that the matter can be dealt with as if both were assisted persons, that is to say, the objection taken to the jurisdiction (on the assumption that it is otherwise well founded) applies if one of the two joint plaintiffs is an assisted person. The master, taking the view that he had no power to make the order, did not deal with the merits of the case, but the learned judge, having decided the question of law adversely to the plaintiffs, went on to hold that in all the circumstances of the case it was a proper one for a transfer. No complaint is made that the learned judge exercised his discretion on a wrong principle assuming (contrary to the plaintiffs' submission) that he had any jurisdiction in the matter.

The County Courts Act, 1934, s. 46, provides:

"(1) Where any action founded on tort is commenced in the High Court, the defendant may, on an affidavit made by himself or by any person on his behalf showing that the plaintiff has no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant should a verdict not be found for the plaintiff, apply to the High Court or a judge thereof for an order to transfer the action to a county court. (2) On any such application, the High Court or judge, unless the plaintiff satisfies the court or judge that he has such means as aforesaid, may, if the court or judge having regard to all the circumstances of the case thinks fit so to do, make an order that, unless the plaintiff within a time to be limited in the order gives security for the defendant's costs to the satisfaction of the court or a judge, the action shall be transferred to such county court, to be named in the order, as the court or judge may deem the most convenient to the parties."

There are two points to be noted about that section. First, an essential condition of its application is that the plaintiff should be shown on affidavit to have no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant should a verdict not be found for the plaintiff. Secondly, the order to be made under the section in a proper case is not, in the ordinary sense, an order for security for costs to be given by the plaintiff, but an order for transfer, which the plaintiff, if he elects to do so, may avoid by giving the security for costs stipulated by the order. No question being raised as to the principle on which the learned judge exercised his discretion, one must take it that, apart from the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the regulations made thereunder, there is no doubt but that the order for transfer was properly made.

A One of the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act to which we were referred as being material for the purposes of the argument in the present case was s. 1 (7), the relevant provision of that sub-section being para. (b). The sub-section provides:

B “Save as expressly provided by this Part of this Act or by regulations made thereunder . . . (b) the rights conferred by this Part of this Act on a person receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or liabilities of other parties to the proceedings or the principles on which the discretion of any court or tribunal is normally exercised.”

C That provision is relied on by the defendant. It is contended on his behalf that s. 46 of the Act of 1934 confers on him a valuable right, which should not be deemed to have been taken away from him by the Act of 1949 or the regulations made thereunder unless there is something amounting to an express provision to that effect. The next reference was to s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1949 which provides:

D “Where a person receives legal aid in connection with any proceedings . . . (e) his liability by virtue of an order for costs made against him with respect to the proceedings shall not exceed the amount (if any) which is a reasonable one for him to pay having regard to all the circumstances, including the means of all the parties and their conduct in connection with the dispute.”

E Use is made of that paragraph by counsel for the plaintiffs. He says, in effect, that, to find out for the purposes of s. 46 of the Act of 1934 whether a plaintiff has visible means of paying the defendant's costs, regard must be had, if he is an assisted person, to the limitation of his liability for costs under the Act of 1949 and the regulations made thereunder, and that, inasmuch as an assisted person's liability for costs is in effect measured by reference to his ability to pay, it can never be said that he has no visible means of paying the defendant's costs if, as is contended, the reference in s. 46 of the Act of 1934 to the defendant's costs should be construed as meaning such costs as the plaintiff, as an assisted person, will or may be ordered to pay to the defendant. Section 2 (3) of the Act of 1949 provides for the making of regulations in regard to the ascertainment of the amount referred to in s. 2 (2) (e). Section 12 (1) provides:

G “The Lord Chancellor may make such regulations as appear to him necessary or desirable for giving effect to this Part of this Act or for preventing abuses thereof.”

G Section 12 (2) enumerates a number of matters for which regulations may provide, and, in particular, s. 12 (2) (b) provides that regulations may be made to

H “regulate the procedure of any court or tribunal in relation to legal aid, and in particular make provision—(i) as to the taxation of costs incurred in connection with proceedings not actually begun; and (ii) as to the cases in which and extent to which a person receiving legal aid may be required to give security for costs, and the manner in which it may be given.”

So far as I know, no regulations have yet been made as to the cases in which, or the extent to which, a person receiving legal aid may be required to give security for costs, or the manner in which it may be given. Therefore, even if s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) could be held to refer to the security to be fixed in an order under s. 46 of the Act of 1934, as an alternative to transfer to the county court, as security within the meaning of this provision in the Legal Aid and Advice Act, nothing has yet been done under that Act purporting to affect the provisions of s. 46 of the Act of 1934 as to security. It was not contended by counsel for the plaintiffs, as I understood him, that s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) of the Act of 1949, was, in fact, referring to security under s. 46 of the Act of 1934, for, as I have said, an order under s. 46 is not, in the ordinary sense, an order requiring security to be given. Security, as fixed, may be given at the option of the plaintiff as an alternative to the transfer otherwise ordered. The order is an order for transfer unless such security is given. I think it is reasonably plain that, by making regulations purporting to regulate the procedure of the court as to requiring security for costs, under s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) of the Act of 1949 the rule-making authority could not take away the right conferred on defendants by s. 46 of the Act of 1934.

We were referred to s. 17 of the Act of 1949 for the definition of "order for costs":

"the expression 'order for costs' includes any judgment, order, decree, award or direction for the payment of the costs of one party to any proceedings by another party, whether given or made in those proceedings or not."

The Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (Commencement) Order, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1357), art. 1, brought the Act into operation, inter alia, in relation to cases which have been remitted or transferred by the Supreme Court of Judicature to a county court, and, therefore, it is clear that the transfer in the present case will not deprive the plaintiffs of their rights as assisted persons, that is to say, it will not deprive the plaintiff, William, who is already an assisted person, or the plaintiff, Leslie, on the assumption that he obtains a certificate. The Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 17, deals with costs awarded against an assisted person and provides for the method of determining the amount of the liability for costs in accordance with s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949. Regulation 17 (1) (d) provides:

"The court may order the assisted person to pay, by instalments or otherwise, either—(i) such amount, if any, as the court thinks reasonable having regard to all the circumstances; or (ii) an amount to be determined on taxation not exceeding such amount as the court thinks reasonable having regard to all the circumstances . . ."

Then there are two provisos of which proviso (ii) is:

"The party in whose favour the order is made may, within six years from the date thereof, apply to the court for the order to be varied on the grounds that there has been a change in the assisted person's circumstances since the date of the order, and on any such application the order may be varied as the court thinks fit."

When the matter came before the learned master, he held himself precluded from making the order for transfer by the decision of this court in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1). In that case the plaintiff had been ordered to give security for the costs of the appeal under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15. After the order for security was made, he became an assisted person and obtained an emergency certificate under the Act of 1949. He applied for a discharge of the order for security and this court held that the order should be discharged. After citing the decision of this court in Willé v. St. John (2), where similar circumstances arose in the case of a person who had been admitted as a poor person under the old Poor Persons Rules (R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 22 to r. 31H), COHEN, L.J., referred to the provisions as to the making of regulations contained in s. 12 of the Act of 1949 and, in particular, to the power to regulate the procedure of any court with respect to security for costs, and came to the conclusion that in the case then before the court, as no special circumstances were shown and there had been no guidance in the form of regulations made under s. 12 as to the circumstances in which security should be ordered, the order ought to be discharged. Counsel for the plaintiffs admits, as the learned judge held, that this case is not governed by Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1), and I entirely agree. The security there in question was a security of a different order. It was security of the kind which the court as a matter of procedure can direct a plaintiff or appellant to give in certain circumstances as a condition of prosecuting his action or appeal. Orders of that kind are orders for security in the strict sense, and, if they are not complied with, the action or appeal in question is stayed or dismissed. In a case in which an appellant had obtained a certificate as an assisted person for the purpose of prosecuting an appeal, an order putting him on terms which required him to give security, or otherwise be shut out from prosecuting his appeal, might well be regarded, in the absence of special circumstances, as inconsistent with the intention of the Act of 1949. The matter here in question is entirely different. As I have said, s. 46 of the Act of 1934, admittedly, is not a section which orders security and, in default, dismisses or stays the action. It is a section under which the court, if in all the circumstances of the case it appears right to do so, may make an order transferring the action to the county court. The plaintiff, if dissatisfied with that, is given the opportunity of preventing the transfer by providing for the stipulated security. Therefore, I think that Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) has no bearing on the present case.

Other authorities, cases under the old Poor Persons Rules, were to some extent relied on by the learned judge. Counsel for the plaintiffs says (and again I agree with him) that those cases cannot be regarded as authorities governing the situation under the entirely different Legal Aid and Advice Act and regulations made thereunder. They are, however, of some assistance by way of analogy. In Perry v. London General Omnibus Co. (3) and Cook v. Imperial Tobacco Co. (4), under the provisions then corresponding to s. 46 of the Act of 1934 the defendants applied for the transfer to the county court of actions brought by poor persons in the High Court. In both those cases orders were made although, as the Poor Persons Rules then stood, the effect of such transfer would be to preclude the plaintiffs from prosecuting their actions in the county court as poor persons, inasmuch as the poor persons' procedure did not provide for litigation in county courts. Thus it may be said that the transfers there made were transfers which did entail some hardship on the plaintiffs, inasmuch as they prejudiced the plaintiffs' rights to sue as poor persons. Nevertheless, the court thought that this hardship was no sufficient ground for denying the defendants their rights under what corresponded to s. 46 of the Act of 1934. Those two decisions do, therefore, afford some analogy, and I think that this case is one in which, on general principles, it seems that, a fortiori those cases, an order for transfer ought to be made.

I now come to what was really the essential argument of counsel for the plaintiffs. It turns on the reference in s. 46 (1) of the Act of 1934 to an affidavit

"... showing that the plaintiff has no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant should a verdict not be found for the plaintiff ..."

"The costs of the defendant," says counsel for the plaintiffs, "must mean such costs as the plaintiff will become liable to pay in the event of the defendant successfully defending the action". It follows, in his submission, that it cannot ever be said of an assisted person that such a person has no visible means of paying the defendant's costs, because the provisions of s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949 and reg. 17 (1) (d) of the regulations of 1950 ensure that the costs payable by the assisted person shall be limited to such amount as, in the judgment of the court, is within the assisted person's means or capacity to pay. Thus, says counsel for the plaintiffs, in effect, although s. 46 of the Act of 1934 has not been repealed or abrogated by the Legal Aid and Advice Act or the regulations made thereunder, as a matter of construction its provisions cannot be applied to an assisted person. The learned judge rejected that argument, and, in my judgment, he was perfectly right in doing so. Section 46 of the Act of 1934 is designed to protect defendants. The relevant costs to which it refers are the costs which the defendant will incur in defending the action. Those are the costs in which he is interested and the relevant matter for the purpose of s. 46 is the absence of any visible means by the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs in that sense, viz., the costs incurred by him, subject, of course, to taxation, or, in other words, the costs which ordinarily an unsuccessful plaintiff would be ordered to pay to the defendant in the event of the usual order for taxation and payment of those costs being made. Judging by that standard, the learned judge held, and, in my view, there was ample ground on which he could so hold, that in the present case the plaintiffs had no visible means of paying the defendant's costs. In my judgment, it cannot be said that their ability to pay the defendant's costs in that sense was one whit increased by the fact that the plaintiff, William, became an assisted person. Indeed, I should have thought that the very fact that he became an assisted person to some extent argues inability to pay the defendant's costs. By way of elaboration of the same argument, counsel for the plaintiffs sought to demonstrate, by reference to the assessment of William's contribution and the provision that he should pay that contribution of £70 10s. by instalments of 30s. per week, that visible means were shown, inasmuch as it seemed probable that, after satisfaction of his contribution of £70 10s. by the instalments of 30s. per week, he would be able to satisfy any costs awarded to the defendant by like instalments. In my judgment, that in no way amounts to showing that the plaintiff has visible means of paying the costs of the defendant within the meaning of s. 46 of the Act of 1934.

In conclusion, I would observe that s. 46 is designed to protect defendants from being put to expenses which they cannot recover from the opposite party in High Court actions brought against them in tort by impecunious plaintiffs. It is a valuable right and a valuable protection to defendants against whom such actions are brought. In my judgment, particularly in view of s. 1 (7) (b) of the Act of 1949, that right should not be held to have been taken away either by the Act of 1949 or by the regulations made thereunder unless something is found in that Act or in those regulations which either expressly or, at least, by necessary implication has that effect. I find no such feature either in the Act or in the regulations. For these reasons, in addition to those given by the learned judge, whose careful judgment in this matter I might well have adopted without adding any reasons of my own, I am of opinion that he came to a right conclusion, and that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I should be content to adopt the observations made by JENKINS, L.J., and add nothing, as I agree most fully with the reasons which he has given for his decision, but, as the point is one of general importance, I will add a few words.

The case came before the learned judge, and it comes before this court, on a misinterpretation of a decision of this court in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1). The distinction between the facts in that appeal and the circumstances which arise when the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 46, is invoked was not clearly kept in mind. The learned master, with other learned masters, took the view that the decision in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) was such that they could not make the order prayed for under s. 46 (1) of the Act of 1934. It is enough for me to say, by way of supplement to what JENKINS, L.J., has already said, that a reading of Conway's case (1) shows that it dealt with an absolutely separate matter—where an order for security for costs had been properly made before the plaintiff became an assisted person, under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. The court held that, in the absence of the regulations which were indicated in s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) of the Act of 1949, an order for security for costs should not be made against a litigant in that position. In the case now before us, the learned judge in the court below pointed out that an order under s. 46 (2) of the Act of 1934 was not an order for security for costs in the strict sense, but was an order transferring the action to the county court if the plaintiff did not give security for the defendant's costs.

A Counsel for the plaintiffs admitted frankly that he could not support the decision of the learned master on the ground on which it was put, as Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) has no application to the facts of the present case. He contended, however, that, by reason of the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the regulations made thereunder, an order under s. 46 (2) of the Act of 1934 could not be made against an assisted person, as it was not possible to say that a plaintiff who had received a legal aid certificate under the Act of 1949

"... has no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant should a verdict not be found for the plaintiff ..."

B He then said that the cases which were cited to the learned judge, and which, admittedly, dealt with the procedure under the old Poor Persons Rules, were no longer applicable, because the conditions had been entirely changed by the Act of 1949, the principle change, in his submission, being that, whereas, under the old Poor Persons Rules, the decision of the judge was completely unfettered, under s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949 and the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 17 (1) (d), it was a fettered discretion. While, however, it may be true C that the earlier cases are no longer strictly applicable, nevertheless, I think, as JENKINS, L.J., has said, that they are of great importance in the present case as showing that the defendant's right, in a proper case, to an order transferring the action to the county court, unless the plaintiff gave security for the defendant's costs, was maintained, and the order was made, even where it was known D that the transfer would mean that the plaintiff, who was suing as a poor person under the old Poor Persons Rules, could not prosecute the action in the county court as a poor person: see, for example, Cook v. Imperial Tobacco Co. (4).

Section 1 (7) of the Act of 1949 provides:

E "Save as expressly provided by this Part of this Act or by regulations made thereunder ... (b) the rights conferred by this Part of this Act on a person receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or liabilities of other parties to the proceedings or the principles on which the discretion of any court or tribunal is normally exercised."

Neither the Act of 1949 nor the regulations made thereunder contain any express provision that s. 46 of the Act of 1934 shall no longer have any application, and it is not contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that they do. His contention is F that, as s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949 and reg. 17 (1) (d) of the regulations of 1950 provide that an assisted person is only required to pay such costs as the court thinks that he can reasonably pay, it is impossible to make an order under s. 46 (2) of the Act of 1934 against an assisted person, as the conditions required to be fulfilled before an order can be made would not exist. Therefore (he says), s. 46 of the Act of 1934 has virtually been repealed by the Act of 1949 and the regulations made thereunder. In support of his contention, counsel for the plaintiffs G submits that the words "no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant" in s. 46 (1) of the Act of 1934, must now be interpreted as "no visible means of paying such costs as should be determined by the court, having regard to s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949 and reg. 17 (1) (d) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950." I cannot think that that interpretation ought to prevail. H The "costs of the defendant," in s. 46 (1) of the Act of 1934, are, I think, the costs which, in the ordinary way, the defendant will incur, or his taxed costs, and I do not think that they are the costs which an assisted person may be ordered to pay under the Act of 1949 and the regulations made thereunder, as contended by counsel for the plaintiffs. Therefore, I agree with the judgment of JENKINS, L.J., that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SLATCHER AND ANOTHER v. GEORGE MENCE SMITH, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Devlin, JJ.), June 14, 15, 28, 1951.]

Trade Mark—False trade description—Short measure given by servant—Liability of master—No finding of inadvertence or mistake—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (c. 28), s. 2 (2) (a), (b), (c).

By the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 2 (2): "Every person who sells ... any goods ... to which any ... false trade description is applied ... shall, unless he proves—(a) That having taken reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this Act, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the ... trade description; and (b) That on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods ...; or (c) That otherwise he had acted innocently; be guilty of an offence against this Act."

An inspector of weights and measures entered the shop of the respondents, a company carrying on business at many branches, and asked for two gallons of paraffin. He was given a quantity which was nearly a pint and a half less than two gallons and a receipt for the purchase price which stated that he had been supplied with two gallons. Justices dismissed an information charging the respondents with selling goods to which a false trade description had been applied, contrary to the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 2 (1), on the ground that the respondents had proved that they had acted in good faith and had done all that was reasonably possible in the way of the supply of accurate measures and the supervision of their servants to prevent the commission by their servants of offences against the Act.

HELD: para. (a) and para. (b) of s. 2 (2) only applied where goods were sold with a false trade description already stamped on them or otherwise applied to them and not in circumstances like those of the present case where the false trade description had been applied on the occasion, and as part of the terms, of sale; the words in para. (c), "otherwise he had acted innocently" were not satisfied by proof that the accused had acted in good faith and had taken all precautions against committing an offence against the Act, but must be construed as meaning that he had acted inadvertently or under a misapprehension or mistake of fact; there was no finding of inadvertence or mistake, and, therefore, the case must go back to the justices with a direction to convict.

CASE STATED by Kent justices.

On Jan. 4, 1951, informations were preferred by the appellant, an inspector of weights and measures, before justices sitting at Ashford, alleging that the respondents sold certain goods, namely paraffin, to which a false trade description was applied contrary to s. 2 (2) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.

A On Dec. 5, 1950, the manager of one of the respondents' shops at Ashford purported to sell to an inspector of weights and measures two gallons of paraffin and gave a receipt for the purchase price in which it was stated that that quantity had been sold, although, in fact, the amount sold was nearly a pint and a half less than two gallons. The respondents supplied their manager with suitable measures and funnels for measuring oil and filling customers' receptacles and representatives visited the premises frequently for inspection. The manager had been B in the respondents' employ for thirty-five years and had been instructed as to the proper use of measures.

For the respondents it was contended that a master was not liable for the actions of his servants or agents in contravention of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, if the master has acted in good faith and done all that was reasonably C possible to prevent the commission of offences against the said Act, and that the respondents had proved a defence under either para. (a), para. (b), or para. (c) of s. 2 (2) of the Act. For the appellant it was contended that the defences under paras. (a) and (b) of s. 2 (2) were not applicable and that the respondents had not proved that they had a defence under para. (c).

The justices, being of opinion that, although paraffin had been sold by the respondents to which a false trade description had been applied, the defence D set up by the respondents had been proved, dismissed the information.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 28. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.

E This is an appeal by way of Case Stated from the justices for the petty sessional division of Ashford, Kent. Two informations were preferred by the appellant, William John Slatcher an inspector of weights and measures, against the respondents, George Mence Smith, Ltd. Each information charged that on Dec. 5, 1950, at Ashford the respondents sold paraffin to which a certain false trade description was then applied, contrary to s. 2 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. The F informations were by consent heard together on Jan. 4, 1951, when the justices dismissed both the informations. Section 3 (1) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, provides:

"For the purposes of this Act . . . The expression 'trade description' means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect, (a) as to the number, quantity, measure, gauge, or weight of any goods . . ."

G The false description alleged in the informations was as to the quantity or measure of the paraffin sold.

On the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted. The respondents carry on business at more than one hundred branches, one of which is at a shop in Bank Street, Ashford. On Dec. 5, 1950, Dennis Webb, an assistant inspector of weights and measures, entered the shop carrying an empty one-gallon can H and asked the manager for a gallon of paraffin. The manager took the can away and brought it back containing paraffin. At Webb's request the manager wrote out and gave to him a receipt which read "Oil, 1s. 9d." Webb remained in the shop. Frederick Smart, another inspector of weights and measures, then entered the shop carrying an empty five-gallon can and asked the manager for two gallons of paraffin. The manager took the can away and brought it back containing paraffin. At Smart's request the manager wrote out and gave him a receipt which read "2 gall. oil, 3s. 0d." The appellant then entered the shop and in the presence of the manager the paraffin in each of the cans was measured. The quantity in the one-gallon can was seventeen fluid ounces (nearly a pint) short of a gallon, and the quantity in the five-gallon can was twenty-nine fluid ounces (nearly a pint and a half) short of two gallons. The justices further found that the respondents supplied their manager with suitable measures and funnels for the purpose of measuring oil and filling customers' receptacles; that representatives of the respondents visited the premises once a week or once a fortnight for the purposes of inspection; and that the manager had been in the respondents' employ for thirty-five years and had been instructed as to the proper use of measures. The justices decided that in both cases paraffin had been sold by the respondents to which a false trade description had been applied and that the proceedings were properly brought under the Act of 1887. They found, however, that the statutory defence set up by the respondents under s. 2 (2) had been proved and, therefore, dismissed both informations.

The first information related to the sale of one gallon of paraffin to Webb. The statement relied on as constituting the false trade description was that contained in the receipt given to him. This receipt, which read "Oil, 1s. 9d.", contained no statement as to the measure or quantity of the oil sold, and the appellant did not pursue the appeal in the case of this information. The second information related to the sale of two gallons of paraffin to Frederick Smart. The statement relied on as constituting the false trade description was that contained in the receipt given to him, which read "2 gall. oil, 3s. 0d." As the paraffin sold was twenty-nine fluid ounces (nearly a pint and a half) short of two gallons, this was a false trade description applied to the goods sold, and the respondents did not seek to challenge the justices' finding to this effect in relation to this information.

The question we have to decide is whether, on the facts found by the justices, it was open to them to hold that the statutory defence set up by the respondents under s. 2 (2) had been established. So far as it is material, s. 2 (2) provides:

"Every person who sells . . . any goods or things to which any forged trade mark or false trade description is applied . . . shall, unless he proves—
(a) That having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this Act, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade mark, mark, or trade description; and (b) That on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods or things; or (c) That otherwise he had acted innocently; be guilty of an offence against this Act."

The justices find generally that the defence in s. 2 (2) has been established without specifying whether that defence was under paras. (a) and (b) or under the alternative para. (c). It seems clear that the defence provided under paras. (a) and (b) was not open to the respondents on the facts of this case. Paragraphs (a) and (b) apply to cases where the goods in question are sold with the forged trade mark or false trade description already stamped on them or otherwise applied to them and not to a case like the present where the false trade description is applied on the occasion, and as part of the terms, of sale. In the latter case the accused must rely for his exculpation on para. (c), namely, by showing "that otherwise he had acted innocently."

The respondents' contention before the justices was that, if they had acted in good faith and had done all that it was reasonably possible to do to prevent the commission by their agents of offences against the Act, they were entitled to be acquitted. The justices appear to have accepted this contention as good in law and to have dismissed the information on the ground that the respondents had established that they had "otherwise acted innocently". We have to consider what is the true construction of these words in their context. In

Coppen v. Moore (No. 2) (1), a Divisional Court of six judges, including SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., and CHITTY, L.J., had to consider the question whether the Act made a master criminally liable for acts done by his servants in contravention of the section when acting in the general scope of their employment although contrary to their master's orders. The judgment of the court was delivered by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., who, in the course of his judgment, said ([1898] A 2 Q.B. 313):

"In our judgment it was clearly the intention of the legislature to make the master criminally liable for such acts, unless he was able to rebut the prima facie presumption of guilt by one or other of the methods pointed out in the Act."

B Having dealt with the question before the court, LORD RUSSELL added obiter (ibid., 314):

"... the master or principal may be relieved from criminal responsibility where he can prove that he had acted in good faith and had done all that it was reasonably possible to do to prevent the commission by his agents and servants of offences against the Act."

C This interpretation of the words "otherwise he had acted innocently" does not seem to have been followed in any of the later reported decisions of this court.

We must pay the greatest respect to the obiter dicta of such a strongly constituted court, but the particular question was not before the court for decision and it is difficult to believe that, if it had been, the court would have come to this conclusion. Section 2 (2) provides two alternative defences, the first under paras.

D (a) and (b), and an alternative defence under para. (c). To establish his defence under (a) and (b) the defendant must prove (i) that he had taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence under the Act, (ii) that at the time of committing the alleged offence he had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade description, and (iii) that on demand he gave all information within his power with respect to the person from whom he obtained such goods or things.

E If he fails to establish any one of these things his defence fails. If the alternative defence in para. (c) is interpreted as meaning that he acted bona fide and had taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence, then, although his defence might fail under (a) and (b), he could still avail himself of the defence of (c). Such an interpretation is to ignore the presence of the word "otherwise" in (c). Looked at from the other point of view, if (c) is construed as suggested,

F paras. (a) and (b) are surplusage and unnecessary, as any person who could satisfy the requirements of (a) and (b) must have been acting bona fide and taking all reasonable precautions against committing an offence under the Act. In our view, the words in their context cannot be construed as having the meaning conceived in Coppen v. Moore (No. 2) (1).

G The section again came before this court in Stone v. Burn (2). In the course of his judgment LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said ([1911] 1 K.B. 931):

"Then arises the question whether the conviction can be quashed on the ground that the appellant proved that he had acted innocently. I cannot say that the justices ought as a matter of law to have held that the appellant had acted innocently and therefore had committed no offence. Mere ignorance of the provisions of the statute does not amount to innocence for this purpose. The words 'acted innocently' point to some misapprehension of fact. And here the appellant did not labour under any mistake of fact, for he did what he did with full knowledge, and claiming that he had a right to do it."

H In the same case LORD COLERIDGE, J., said (ibid., 933):

"The only defence could be that he was acting innocently. But, as was said by CHANNELL, J., in Christie, Manson & Woods v. Cooper (3) ([1900]

2 Q.B. at p. 528), 'The innocence contemplated by the Act is innocence of any intention to infringe the Act of Parliament . . . ' Such innocence can only exist where the infraction was committed by inadvertence or mistake of fact."

The effect of the decision in Stone v. Burn (2) is that the words "that otherwise he had acted innocently" mean that he had acted by inadvertence or under misapprehension or mistake of fact. In Allard v. Selfridge & Co. (4) the passage set out above from the judgment of LORD COLERIDGE is quoted with approval by LORD HEWART, C.J. ([1925] 1 K.B. at p. 135) and by SHEARMAN, J. (ibid., 139).

In Mercer v. Pyramid Sand & Gravel Co. (5) VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, C.J., said (109 J.P. 56):

"The defence raised was that 'otherwise' they had acted innocently, which means, in my opinion that they had acted in some way, as LORD COLERIDGE, J., said in Stone v. Burn (2), by inadvertence or mistake of fact. The respondents have done no more than satisfy the justices, whose finding of fact bind us, that they had acted innocently in the sense that they had no intention to infringe the statute, but that, according to the decision of the court in Allard v. Selfridge & Co. (4), is not the meaning of the words."

In the same case BIRKETT, J. (ibid., 57), quoted the passage from the judgment of LORD COLERIDGE, J., in Stone v. Burn (2), again with approval. The section was last considered in this court in Kat v. Diment (6) where LORD GODDARD, C.J., cited the passages both from the judgment of LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., and LORD COLERIDGE, J., with approval ([1950] 2 All E.R. at p. 660).

In this state of the authorities it seems to us that we must construe the words "that otherwise he had acted innocently" as meaning that he had acted inadvertently or under some mistake of fact. The fact that he had acted in good faith and had taken all precautions against committing an offence against the Act will not amount to proof that the defendant had otherwise acted innocently. This is all that the justices have found proved in this case. There is no finding of inadvertence or mistake. The case must go back to them with a direction that the statutory defence set up before them by the respondents has not been proved and that they should convict the respondents.

Case remitted.

affirmed. H.L. [1952] 2 All E.R. 548. LITTMAN v. BARRON (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Singleton and Jenkins, L.J.J.), April 30, May 1, 2, 3, June 15, 1951.]

Income Tax—Sched. D—Relief in respect of losses—Set-off against profits—Excess rent of immediate lessor—“Profits”—Leasehold properties sub-let at rents exceeding head rents and net annual values—Other properties sub-let at rents below head rents or not sub-let—Finance Act, 1927 (c. 10), s. 27 (1)—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), s. 15 (1).

The taxpayer, a dealer in property, held a number of leasehold properties, some of which he had sub-let at rents which exceeded both the respective head rents and the respective net annual values, and others of which he had sub-let at rents which were below the head rents and the net annual values, still others being not sub-let. For the year 1942-43 he was assessed to tax under case VI of sched. D by virtue of the Finance Act, 1940, s. 15 (1), on the excess rents arising from the properties sub-let at rents exceeding the head rents and the net annual values. It was not disputed by the taxpayer that he was liable to be assessed in respect of the excess rents, but he claimed to be entitled, under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 27 (1), to set against them the deficiencies in rent which he had suffered during the same year in respect of the properties which he had sub-let at rents below the head rents and the net annual values and of those which were not sub-let.

HELD (JENKINS, L.J., dissentiente): section 15 of the Act of 1940 directed a tax on profits under case VI of sched. D; the word “profit” in s. 27 (1) meant a profit ascertained as directed by Parliament, and it was immaterial, in considering the application of that sub-section to the present facts, that part of the commercial profit might be taxable under sched. A; and, therefore, the acquisition and management of each of the properties in question was to be regarded as a transaction of such a nature that, if profits had arisen therefrom, the taxpayer would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D, and he was entitled to set-off his losses under s. 27 (1).

Decision of WYNN-PARRY, J. ([1951] 1 All E.R. 701), reversed.

Per COHEN, L.J.: The principle that in case of ambiguity a taxing statute should be construed in favour of the taxpayer does not apply to a provision giving a taxpayer relief in certain cases from a section clearly imposing liability.

APPEAL by the taxpayer from an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Feb. 28, 1951, and reported [1951] 1 All E.R. 701, made on a Case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The Special Commissioners held that "excess rents" within the Finance Act, 1940, s. 15 (1), did not constitute "profits" within the Finance Act, 1927, s. 27 (1), so that the taxpayer was precluded from claiming an allowance under s. 27 (1) in respect of losses suffered by him in relation to certain of his leasehold properties which were either sub-let by him in the course of his business as property dealer at rents less than those payable by him, or not sub-let. WYNN-PARRY, J., affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 15. The following judgments were read.

COHEN, L.J.: The appellant is an owner of properties. In the three financial years in question he owned twenty-eight leasehold properties. He had sub-let twenty-three of them at a profit rental. Two were let at rents lower than the rents payable by him to the respective head lessors. He had failed to sub-let the remaining three although he had tried to do so. He was assessed to income tax under sched. A on the annual value of the properties and also as regards the twenty-three properties in respect of what may be conveniently, though not entirely accurately, referred to as the excess rents derived therefrom under case VI of sched. D pursuant to the Finance Act, 1940, s. 15. Sub-section (1) of that section provides:

"If, as respects any year of assessment, the immediate lessor of a unit of assessment is entitled in respect of the unit to any rent payable under a lease or leases to which this section applies, he shall be chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D in respect of the excess, if any, of the amount which would have been the amount of the assessment of the unit for the purposes of sched. A, as reduced for the purpose of collection, if the annual value of the unit had been determined (in accordance, in whatever part of the United Kingdom the unit is situated, with the rules applicable to sched. A set out in sched. I to the Income Tax Act, 1918) by reference to that rent and the other terms of the lease or leases, over whichever is the greater of—
(a) the actual amount of the assessment of the unit for the purposes of sched. A, as reduced for the purpose of collection; or (b) the amount of any rent payable by the immediate lessor in respect of the unit under any short lease or short leases."

The appellant did not dispute the Crown's right to assess him in respect of those excess rents, but he claimed to be entitled to a deduction in respect of losses which he said he had sustained in respect of the other five properties. He claimed that deduction under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 27 (1), which provided as follows:

"Where in any year of assessment a person sustains a loss in any transaction, whether he was engaged therein solely or in partnership, being a transaction of such a nature that, if any profits had arisen therefrom, he would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D, he may claim that the amount of the loss sustained by him shall, as far as may be, be deducted from or set-off against the amount of any profits or gains arising from any transaction in respect of which he is assessed for that year under the said case VI, and that any portion of the loss for which relief is not so given shall, as far as may be, be carried forward and deducted from or set-off against the amount of any profits or gains arising from any transaction in respect of which he is assessed under the said case VI for any of the six following years of assessment."

The contentions advanced on behalf of the taxpayer before the Special Commissioners are set out in the Case as follows:

"(1) That the appellant was engaged in a transaction within s. 27 of the Finance Act, 1927, namely, the acquisition and management of the properties listed in para. 4. (2) Alternatively, that the appellant was engaged in five such transactions, namely, in respect of each of the said properties. (3) That in respect of each of the first two of the said properties the appellant sustained a loss in an amount represented by the excess of the rent paid by him over the supposed annual value computed according to s. 15 of the Finance Act, 1940. (4) That in respect of each of the remaining said properties the appellant sustained a loss in an amount equal to the rent paid by him. (5) That if sums in excess, in each instance, of the net sched. A assessments had been received by the appellant in respect of the said properties, those sums would have been profits in amounts computed in accordance with s. 15 of the Finance Act, 1940 (there called an excess), and those profits would, by the express terms of the said s. 15, have been assessable under sched. D, and under case VI thereof. (6) That the sums in question in this appeal were the amounts of losses sustained by the appellant in transactions of such a nature that, if profits had arisen therefrom, the appellant would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D. (7) That the appellant was entitled to carry forward the sums in question in this appeal, and to deduct them from, or set them off against, the amounts of the profits or gains forming the subjects of the assessments under appeal."

Before us his counsel admitted that the dealing with each property must be regarded as a separate transaction. I need not, therefore, trouble further with the first contention.

The Crown's contentions are stated in the Case as follows:

"(1) That the holding by the appellant of the properties described in para. 4 hereof some of which he sub-let and some of which remained void was not a transaction or transactions. (2) That even if there were in this case any such transactions they were not of such a nature, as is described in s. 27 (1) of the Finance Act, 1927, that 'if any profits had arisen therefrom, he would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D...' because such profits, if any, would have been covered by the sched. A assessment. (3) That s. 15 of the Finance Act, 1940, did not charge profits as such, but a sum described as the excess of an amount calculated in accordance with the provisions of the section, and was therefore inapplicable in considering what relief should be given under s. 27 of the Finance Act, 1927."

The Special Commissioners and WYNN-PARRY, J., both decided in favour of the Crown in substance on the ground that, whether or no there was a transaction within the meaning of s. 27, it was not a transaction of such a nature that, if any profits had arisen therefrom, the taxpayer would have been liable to be assessed in respect of those profits. They took the view that s. 27 contemplated loss and profit ascertained in the commercial sense and that excess rents ascertained in the artificial way required by s. 15 of the Act of 1940 could not be said to be profits within the meaning of s. 27.

From the decision of WYNN-PARRY, J., the taxpayer now appeals to this court. The subjects debated before us were as follows: (i) What was the nature of the excess rents which were subjected to tax by s. 15 of the Act of 1940? Were they, as the Attorney-General contended, merely an addition to the annual value of the land retaining the characteristics of income from property in land but brought into charge for the purposes of administrative convenience under case VI of sched. D, or were they, as counsel for the taxpayer argued, annual profits and gains taxable under sched. D? (ii) As regards the properties in respect of which the taxpayer suffered a loss, could he be said to have incurred that loss in a transaction of such a nature that if any profits had arisen therefrom he would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched.

D? The second question raised two subsidiary points: (i) What was the transaction from which the profits could be said to be derived? (ii) What was the meaning of the expression "profits" in s. 27?

In support of his argument on the first point, the Attorney-General went shortly through the history of income tax and pointed out that from the beginning until 1940 the only method of taxing income from the ownership of land was under sched. A on the annual value. When, in the 1920's, the Crown sought to tax a property company under sched. D the claim was at once rejected by the House of Lords in Fry v. Salisbury House Estate, Ltd. (1). LORD ATKIN said ([1930] A.C. 454):

"My Lords, I think that this case should be decided in favour of the respondents upon the simple ground that annual income derived from the ownership of lands, tenements and hereditaments can only be assessed under sched. A and in accordance with the rules of that schedule. In my opinion it makes no difference that the income so derived forms part of the annual profits of a trading concern. For the purpose of assessing such profits for the purpose of sched. D the income so derived is not to be brought into account. The option of the revenue authorities to assess under whichever schedule they prefer in my opinion does not exist, and is inconsistent with the provisions of the Income Tax Acts throughout their history."

The decision was only of importance to the revenue as regards London properties the annual value of which was fixed under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. The annual value of other properties is measured by r. 1 of the rules applicable to sched. A and is the actual rent if the hereditaments were let at a rackrent within seven years of the assessment, or, if not, the rackrent which they were actually worth subject to the statutory allowances. Under this rule, there could not be substantial divergence between annual value as ascertained under the rule and the true rackrent. The trouble as regards London properties was met by the Finance Act, 1930, s. 31, which in effect made the rules for ascertaining annual value theretofore applicable to the rest of England applicable also in London. The sanctity of sched. A was, however, maintained and all income from the ownership of land continued to be taxed under that schedule. Section 15 of the Act of 1940 was, said the Attorney-General, introduced for a different reason. The war was on, and it was anticipated that it would be impossible to carry out the quinquennial valuation of properties due to be carried out in 1941. If that were so and nothing were done, it would necessarily mean that the Crown would suffer a substantial loss of revenue. This, said the Attorney-General, was the reason for s. 15. That reason did not require an infringement of the sanctity of sched. A and we ought not so to construe s. 15 as to involve that sacrilege. He sought to reinforce this argument by a reference to the language of s. 15 itself. Sub-section (1) made assessment under sched. A the basis of ascertainment of the higher figure in the subtraction sum by which the amount of the excess was to be ascertained.

Counsel for the taxpayer replied that we must construe the section from its language and not by a research into ancient history. He took us at length through the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and pointed out that (a) no matter what be the schedule under which the tax is levied, it is always a tax on income and that annual value is merely the prescribed method of measuring that income in the case of tax levied under sched. A (see per LORD ATKINSON in Coman v. Rotunda Hospital, Dublin (Governors) (2)); (b) the terms "profits", or "profits and gains", are used indiscriminately in a number of sections of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and the amending Acts, and in contexts in which they must include excess rents taxed under s. 15 of the Act of 1940—e.g., s. 100 of the Act of 1918, for, if not, the amount of the excess rents would not have to be included in the statement required under that section. He also pointed out that in 1940 Parliament had drawn a purely artificial distinction between short and long leases, the latter, under s. 13, being leases for a term exceeding fifty years other than a lease for a term of years determinable after the death or marriage of a person. So far as long leases are concerned, Parliament had made a drastic alteration as regards the method of taxation of income derived from properties, for s. 17 of the Act of 1940 provided:

A “(2) Rules 1 and 4 of No. VIII of sched. A shall not apply to any payment to which this section applies, but any such payment shall, so far as it does fall under any other Case, be charged with tax under case VI of sched. D and be treated for the purposes of such of the provisions of the Income Tax Acts as apply to royalties paid in respect of the user of a patent as if it were such a royalty.”

B That being so, there was no reason for refusing to give to s. 15 the meaning which its language prima facie bore. That section directed that the taxpayer should be assessed in respect of the excess, if any, as therein defined under case VI of sched. D. Looking at the relevant provisions of the Act of 1918, they define case VI as covering

C “tax in respect of any annual profits or gains not falling under any of the foregoing cases, and not charged by virtue of any other schedule.”

Anything assessed under case VI, said counsel for the taxpayer, must, therefore, be a profit, and the true effect of s. 15 is that it directs a tax on profits, the amount of such profits being ascertained by working out the arithmetic prescribed by the section.

D I have come to the conclusion that up to this point counsel for the taxpayer is right, but it does not, however, necessarily follow that the taxpayer is entitled to the relief he seeks under s. 27. He can only deduct the loss he suffered in respect of his dealings with any particular property if the second question is also answered in his favour, i.e., if the loss he seeks to set-off arises from a transaction of such a nature that, if any profits had arisen therefrom, he would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D. The Attorney-General

E says that there is nothing which can be said to be a transaction. He asks: “What is the transaction?” Not, he says, the acquisition, for that does not per se involve profit or loss, and so far as the sale and purchase of land is concerned s. 15 is irrelevant. Not the letting of the property, since that will not help the taxpayer, at any rate in cases where the property is unlet. He pointed out by reference to the list of subjects of charge brought into case VI by amending Acts, which appear on p. 169 of the Stationery Office reprint of the Act, that there are a number of such subjects of charge which cannot be said to have arisen from a transaction which was of a commercial nature or give rise to loss or profit in the commercial sense—for example, excessive housekeeper relief resulting from apportionment of a double claim. He submitted that s. 27 had been introduced

F as a result of such decisions as Ryall v. Hoare. Ryall v. Honeywill (3) and Lyons v. Coucher (4). The effect of these decisions was to make the profits of isolated transactions of a commercial nature taxable under case VI, and without s. 27 the taxpayer would have been without redress if in a subsequent year a similar transaction resulted in a loss. I am prepared to accept the Attorney-General’s explanation of the origin of s. 27, but it does not seem to me necessarily to lead to the conclusion that s. 27 does not apply in the present case. Counsel

G H for the taxpayer submitted that the transaction is the acquisition of the property and the subsequent management of it. Plainly, as counsel points out, the transaction need not be in the year of assessment. The only question is whether in the year of assessment loss or profit results from it. There is, therefore, no reason for not looking back to the original acquisition as part of the transaction. The transaction as a whole covers a number of acts: (i) the acquisition of the property, (ii) payment of the head rent, (iii) the attempt to sub-let, (iv) in three cases the actual sub-letting, (v) the receipt of the rent from the sub-tenant.

I have come to the conclusion that on this point also counsel for the taxpayer is right, and that the losses in question arose in the case of each property from a transaction consisting, as it is put in the Case, in the acquisition and management of the property concerned.

A more difficult point, however, is as to the meaning to be put on "loss" and "profit" in s. 27. The argument of the Attorney-General may be stated as follows. Both words must be used in their ordinary commercial sense. If that be so, it is clear that s. 27 cannot apply, since, using the formula prescribed by s. 15, it is quite possible that, although there is in a given year a commercial profit, no assessment could be made under case VI because the sched. A assessment was higher than the rent receivable from the sub-tenant. In such a case it could not be truly said that the transaction was of such a nature that if any profit had arisen therefrom the immediate lessor would have been liable to be assessed under case VI of sched. D. Counsel for the taxpayer suggested that this argument was based on a misreading of the word "assessed." "To be assessed" meant, according to him, "to have his liability calculated," and a taxpayer would have been assessed even though the result might be a nil assessment. In support of his argument, counsel relied on Harling v. Celynen Collieries Workmen's Institute (5), but I do not think that case affords any assistance, as the court was considering the meaning of the expression "year of assessment," not of the word "assessed." A year may well be a year of assessment, though owing to the result of the year's trading being a loss no assessment is actually made on the taxpayer. I think junior counsel for the Crown gave the right answer to this argument when he said that although the Inland Revenue authorities may at times issue a "nil assessment," that is merely a convenient method of informing the taxpayer that no charge is being made. In its literal meaning "nil assessment" is a contradiction in terms. Alternatively, counsel for the taxpayer argued that although there cannot be a loss unless there is a commercial loss, the reference to profit is not a reference to commercial profit, but to a profit taxable under case VI. In considering, therefore, whether a particular transaction gives rise to a profit liable to be taxed under case VI of sched. D, you must apply the rules to be found in the Act of 1918 and the amending Acts in order to ascertain as regards any particular transaction whether there is such a profit. The fact that in some cases there may be a commercial profit and yet no assessment under case VI is nihil ad rem. The Attorney-General also submitted that s. 27 could not apply because the taxpayer was taxed as regards rents partly under sched. A and partly under case VI. Both sources of income, said the Attorney-General, arose from the same transaction. Therefore, it was impossible to say that if there had been a profit the taxpayer would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI.

The answer to this point, I think, is that, if Parliament chooses, as it has done, to split the income arising from ownership of property into separate subjects of tax, the taxpayer who has made a loss is entitled to say that, although part of his income from the transaction is taxed under sched. A, he would still be liable, if there had been a profit ascertained as directed by Parliament, to be taxed on that profit under case VI, and it is immaterial that part of the commercial profit may have been taxable under sched. A. On the whole, though not without hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that this argument is well founded, and that the taxpayer is entitled to succeed.

In view of an argument addressed to us by junior counsel for the Crown, I would add that I agree with him that the principle that in case of ambiguity a taxing statute should be construed in favour of a taxpayer does not apply to a provision giving a taxpayer relief in certain cases from a section clearly imposing liability. None the less, I arrive at the conclusion I have reached all the more gladly because it is manifest that the Crown's argument, if successful, might involve that the taxpayer would have to pay income tax and possibly surtax on excess rents from one or more properties, although his income from properties as a whole and possibly from all sources was nil. As SINGLETON, L.J., put it in the course of the argument, the taxpayer would be worse off than he would have been if the Crown had won the Salisbury House case (1). The Crown's argument would also involve an unfortunate distinction between an owner of the unexpired portion of a lease for fifty years (a long lease to which s. 17 of the Act of 1940 applies) and the owner of the unexpired portion of a lease for forty-nine years (a short lease within s. 15), since it is common ground between the parties that in the case of excess rents under long leases the intermediate lessor by virtue of s. 17 gets the relief which the taxpayer seeks to have in this appeal. In conclusion, I would add that it seems to me reasonable to suppose that Parliament, when it placed excess rents within case VI of sched. D, intended the taxpayer to be entitled to any relief attaching to that Case, including s. 27 of the Act of 1927. Such an intention would be in conformity with what the Attorney-General said was the reason for the original introduction of s. 27. I would allow the appeal.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The taxpayer is described in the Case as a dealer in property. That, we were told, means that he is one who acquires leases of property and, thereafter, endeavours to let the properties comprised in the various leases on terms advantageous to himself. At all material times, he held short leases of twenty-eight properties. The leases were short leases as defined in the Finance Act, 1940, s. 13. The taxpayer is not assessable under case I or under case II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. That follows from the decision in Fry v. Salisbury House Estate, Ltd. (1). In that case it was sought to assess the company in respect of excess rents under sched. D, though the property was already assessed under sched. A, and it was held that the rents were profits arising from the ownership of land in respect of which the assessment under sched. A was exhaustive, and that they could not be included in the assessment under sched. D as trade receipts of the company.

If a company, or an individual, could be regarded as a trader, trade losses would be a proper and legitimate deduction, and, if the nature of the trade consisted of taking leases and re-letting, a loss on one would be set-off against profits on others in order to arrive at the annual profits or gains from the trade or business.

Under s. 15 of the Act of 1940 excess rents of immediate lessors arising under certain short leases are made subject to tax. The immediate lessor is chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D in respect of the excess. Leaving out any question of allowances, the excess is the amount by which the rent received exceeds the rent paid under a short lease, or by which it exceeds the sched. A assessment if that is greater than the rent paid. It is thus profit to the immediate lessor. The liability to tax is in respect of the excess, and to bring it within the framework of the Income Tax Act, 1918, it is put, and rightly put, under sched. D and embraced under case VI of that schedule—tax in respect of any profits or gains not falling under any of the foregoing Cases, and not charged by virtue of any other schedule. The section was dealing with excess rents: it was designed to enable tax to be collected in respect of profit rentals. Thus, from the passing of, or from the coming into force of, the Act of 1940, if profits arose from the transaction the taxpayer was liable to be assessed in respect of them, i.e., in respect of the excess rents. He was brought in under sched. D, which covers annual profits or gains, but he was brought under case VI and not under case I.

The claim of the Crown in this appeal is that the taxpayer is in a far worse position than he would be if he was to be regarded as a trader. They say that s. 15 of the Act of 1940 ought not to be regarded as undoing the effect of the Salisbury House case (1), but that it goes much further, and that its effect in the case of short leases is that a man who engages in this business of taking short leases and re-letting must pay tax on each case in which he makes a profit, but can never deduct, or set-off, a loss which he makes on another property. The position is shown by the figures given on document A attached to the Case:—on twenty-three properties the taxpayer receives excess rents amounting to £4,830, whereas on five other properties he incurs a loss of £3,575. The claim of the Crown is that he is chargeable to tax in respect of the £4,830, and that he is not entitled to any deduction in respect of the other properties on which he lost £3,575—and this involves a considerable sum in income tax and surtax. It would strike one as surprising if this should be the true position in regard to short leases, for it is agreed that in the case of excess rents under long leases the position is otherwise, and the immediate lessor, by virtue of the provisions of s. 17, is given the relief which the taxpayer seeks to have in this appeal. And no one can suggest any reason why the taxpayer should be differently treated according to whether he held short leases or long leases. (A long lease might be approaching its end while a short lease might have many years to run.)

I do not think that I have encountered anything more complicated than the Act of 1940. This court spent much time on Tamplin & Son's Brewery Brighton, Ltd. v. Nash (Inspector of Taxes) (6) last year in considering the true meaning and effect of s. 17 (long leases), and we have now spent some days on s. 15 (short leases), and these are not the only troublesome sections. I cannot believe that it was the intention of the legislature to make the position of the taxpayer in this case worse than it would have been if the Salisbury House case (1) had been decided the other way, nor can I see any reason why he should be better off if he held long leases than he would be if he held short leases.

The whole question depends on whether the Finance Act, 1927, s. 27, applies to this case. I have come to the conclusion that it does apply. The Act of 1940 does not interfere with the incidence of sched. A tax. If the excess rent is the difference between the rent received and the rent paid it is profit to the taxpayer: if the excess rent is the difference between the rent received and the sched. A assessment it is part of the profit made by the taxpayer. In either case, it is profit within the words "profits or gains not falling under any of the foregoing Cases." They are profits in fact, and they are so treated for the purpose of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The taxpayer is chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D in respect of the excess. That I read in the same way as "liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D" in s. 27 of the Act of 1927. Was there a "transaction" of such a nature that, if profits had arisen therefrom, the taxpayer would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D? If so, the provisions of s. 27 of the Act of 1927 apply. Now the legislature has said by s. 15 of the Act of 1940 that in respect of excess rents therein mentioned the taxpayer shall be chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D—which excess, as I have said, is profit to the taxpayer. How did the taxpayer become entitled to the excess rent? Surely the answer is, by the transaction of acquiring the lease, managing and sub-letting. That is the transaction. It was argued on behalf of the Crown that the original taking by the taxpayer was not a transaction within the section, even if it could be said that a letting by the taxpayer was, and, further, that it could not be said that the failure to let a property was a transaction which resulted in a loss. It is necessary to consider the taxpayer's activities. He acquired leases of properties for the purpose of obtaining profit in the way of increased rent. Each acquisition by him was for him a transaction out of which profit or loss might result, perhaps a profit in one year and a loss in another, or the following, year. In my view, the transaction ought to be regarded as being the acquisition of the lease, and if a loss occurs it matters not for the purposes of the section whether the loss results from letting at a smaller rent than that paid or from failure to let at all. This, I believe, provides the right answer to the problem. Any other view would be placing too narrow a construction on the word "profits" in s. 27 of the Act of 1927, and would result in injustice and in a wholly unexplained distinction between the position of the taxpayer in regard to short leases as against long leases. I am in favour of allowing the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of WYNN-PARRY, J., affirming a decision of the Special Commissioners in favour of the Crown on a question arising under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 27, and the Finance Act, 1940, s. 15, in the following circumstances.

The taxpayer, who is described in the Stated Case as a dealer in property and appears to have made a practice of acquiring leasehold properties with a view to re-letting them at a profit, had on hand during the year ended Apr. 5, 1943 (which has been taken as typical for the purpose of deciding the question of principle involved in the case), twenty-eight such properties. Of these, twenty-three had been re-let by him at rents exceeding those at which he took them, and also exceeding the amounts of their respective assessments under sched. A of the Income Tax Act, 1918, the aggregate excess of rents receivable over sched. A assessments amounting in these twenty-three cases to £4,830. Of the remaining five properties, two had been let by him at rents lower than those for which he was himself liable and three had not been let at all, the aggregate deficiency of rents receivable as compared with rents payable in respect of these five properties amounting to £3,575. It will thus be seen that, according to the ordinary acceptation of the expressions "profit" and "loss," the taxpayer had made a profit for the year on the twenty-three properties, represented by the excess of the rents he received over the rents he paid for them, but had made a loss for the year on the remaining five properties represented by the excess of the rents he paid over the rents (if any) he received in those five cases. His actual profit on the twenty-three properties would in fact be greater than the £4,830 excess over the aggregate amount of their respective sched. A assessments if, as would seem to have been the case, the rents he paid for them were below the amounts of those assessments, but, as will be seen hereafter, the excess of rent receivable over the sched. A assessment, not the actual profit, is the relevant figure for the present purpose in any case in which the sched. A assessment exceeds the rent payable. On the other hand, the deficiency of £3,575 of rents receivable as compared with rents payable does represent his actual loss, in the ordinary or business sense of that expression, on the remaining five properties for the year in question. In these circumstances, the taxpayer admittedly became liable, by virtue of the Finance Act, 1940, s. 15, to be assessed to income tax under case VI of sched. D on the £4,830 representing the excess of the rents received for the twenty-three properties over the aggregate amount of their respective sched. A assessments. But, while not contesting this liability, he claimed by virtue of the Finance Act, 1927, s. 27, to be entitled to set-off against or deduct from this excess of £4,830 the loss of £3,575 sustained on the remaining five properties. That claim was rejected by the Special Commissioners. Their decision was affirmed by the learned judge, and the present appeal results.

As the law stood before the Finance Act, 1940, s. 15, came into operation, the income tax liability in respect of the twenty-three houses would have been limited to tax at the standard rate on the amounts of their sched. A assessments notwithstanding that they had in fact been let at rents exceeding those amounts, so that in effect the taxpayer would have enjoyed tax-free so much of the profit rental received by him in respect of each property as represented an excess over and above the amount of its sched. A assessment. I will assume by way of illustration that, in a year when the standard rate of tax was 10s. in the £, the taxpayer held at a rent of £100 a property with a sched. A assessment of £300 and had re-let it to an occupying tenant at a rent of £400. In such a case the occupier would in the first instance have paid tax at the standard rate of 10s. in the £ on the sched. A assessment of £300=£150. Having so paid, the occupier would have been entitled to deduct the £150 tax from the rent of £400 payable by him to the taxpayer, who would thus have received £400 less £150=£250. The taxpayer, in his turn, on paying the rent of £100 to his superior landlord, would have been entitled to deduct the tax thus suffered by him up to 10s. in the £ on the amount of rent payable by the taxpayer, the superior landlord thus receiving £100 less £50=£50. In the result, therefore, the taxpayer would have borne tax on the rent of £400 received by him only to the extent of £100 (that is, £150 less £50 recovered by deduction from the superior landlord), or, in other words, tax at the standard rate of 10s. in the £ on so much only of his profit rental as represented the difference (i.e., £200) between the rent payable by him (that is, £100) and the sched. A assessment (i.e., £300), and would thus in effect have enjoyed tax-free the remaining £100 of his profit rental, representing the excess of the rent receivable by him over the sched. A assessment. On the other hand, if, with rents payable and receivable of £100 and £400 respectively as above, the sched. A assessment had been £400 instead of £300, the occupying tenant would have paid and deducted from the rent payable to the taxpayer £200, and the taxpayer would have deducted as before £50 from the rent payable by him, and would thus have been left to bear himself tax amounting to £150, or, in other words, tax at the full standard rate of 10s. in the £ on the whole of the profit represented by the £300 by which the rent he received exceeded the rent he paid. Moreover, although charged with tax at the full standard rate on the whole of the surplus of £300 realised by him in this imaginary example, there would have been no question of his setting-off against that figure any amount he might have been out of pocket over some other property which he had only been able to re-let at a lower rent than the rent he had himself to pay for it, or had been unable to re-let at all.

To summarise the position as it stood before the Finance Act, 1940, s. 15, came into operation:—(i) The charge of tax at the standard rate on the amount of the assessment made under sched. A by reference to the annual value of a property ascertained in accordance with the provisions of that schedule exhausted the liability to tax of the income derived from the letting of that property even though the rent actually derived from it might exceed the amount of the sched. A assessment; (ii) Schedule A was not concerned with profit and loss in the sense of excess or deficiency of receipts as compared with outgoings, but simply with the annual value ascertained in accordance with its terms, which was presumed for tax purposes to represent the income derived from the property and served as the statutory measure of such income: see, for the first proposition, Fry v. Salisbury House Estate, Ltd. (1) and, for the second, Coman v. Rotunda Hospital, Dublin (Governors) (2), per LORD ATKINSON.

The group of sections in which s. 15 of the Finance Act, 1940, appears (comprising s. 13 to s. 18 of that Act) has, undoubtedly, displaced the first of these propositions. The question in this case is, in effect, how far, if at all, these sections in conjunction with the Finance Act, 1927, s. 27, have displaced the second. There is no doubt that the primary object of this group of sections in the Finance Act, 1940, was to bring into effect charge to tax the amounts by which rents received for properties assessable to tax under sched. A exceed the amount of their sched. A assessments, or, to be strictly accurate, to subject rents received for properties to the same amount of tax as they would have attracted if the sched. A assessment had been made in each case by reference to the rent actually received for the property during the relevant period.

The Finance Act, 1940, s. 13, contains a number of definitions:

“ ‘ immediate lessor ’ means in relation to any premises—(a) if different parts of the premises are the subject of separate tenancies or separate occupations, a lessor of the whole or any part of the premises whose estate or interest extends to the entirety of the premises and is not subject, immediately or mediately, to a lease of the entirety thereof; and (b) in any other case, a lessor whose immediate tenant is occupying or entitled to occupy the entirety of the premises: Provided that if, in any case to which para. (a) of this definition applies, there is more than one lessor satisfying the conditions set out in that paragraph, one of those lessors shall be deemed to be the immediate lessor whose estate or interest is not reversionary on the estate or interest of any of the others; 'long lease' means a lease granted for a term exceeding fifty years, other than a lease which is or takes effect as a lease for a term of years determinable after the death or marriage of any person; 'short lease' means a lease which is not a long lease; 'unit of assessment' means any land which forms a unit of assessment for the purposes of sched. A."

The leases with which this appeal is concerned are all short leases, and the taxpayer is in each case the immediate lessor. The section directly applicable is, therefore, s. 15, which provides:

"(1) If, as respects any year of assessment, the immediate lessor of a unit of assessment is entitled in respect of the unit to any rent payable under a lease or leases to which this section applies, he shall be chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D in respect of the excess, if any, of the amount which would have been the amount of the assessment of the unit for the purposes of sched. A, as reduced for the purpose of collection, if the annual value of the unit had been determined (in accordance, in whatever part of the United Kingdom the unit is situated, with the rules applicable to sched. A set out in sched. I to the Income Tax Act, 1918) by reference to that rent and the other terms of the lease or leases, over whichever is the greater of—
(a) the actual amount of the assessment of the unit for the purposes of sched. A, as reduced for the purpose of collection; or (b) the amount of any rent payable by the immediate lessor in respect of the unit under any short lease or short leases . . . (3) Where for any year an assessment has been made on an immediate lessor by virtue of this section, the amount of any relief which may be claimed by him under r. 8 of No. V of sched. A shall be such amount as could have been claimed by him if the annual value of the unit had been determined in the manner described in sub-s. (1) of this section. (4) A lease shall be deemed to be a lease to which this section applies if, and only if, the following conditions are fulfilled with respect to it—(a) that it is a short lease; (b) that the land comprised in it is or forms part of a single unit of assessment; (c) that the rent under it is payable to the immediate lessor of that unit; (d) that the estate or interest of the immediate lessor of that unit is not, as respects any part of that unit, subject to any short lease which comprises also land not wholly within that unit, being a lease the rent under which is payable to that immediate lessor."

It will be seen that the method of charging tax on rents in excess of actual sched. A assessments prescribed in cases to which s. 15 applies is to make the "excess" ascertained as therein provided chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D.

For the taxpayer, it is in effect contended that this is a new departure in the method of taxing rents which, while making him liable to tax on the excess admittedly realised as regards the twenty-three properties, does so, not by treating the excess as rent to be brought into effective charge to tax by means of an upward revision of the sched. A assessments, but by treating it as a profit taxable under a different schedule, namely, sched. D, case VI, and that, as he is thus made liable to assessment under case VI on the footing that the excess is a profit arising from his lettings of the twenty-three properties, it follows that he must be entitled by virtue of the Finance Act, 1927, s. 27, to deduct from or set-off against such profit the loss he has sustained with respect to the five properties which he has either let at rents lower than those he had to pay or failed to let at all.

The Finance Act, 1927, s. 27, is in these terms:

"(1) Where in any year of assessment a person sustains a loss in any transaction, whether he was engaged therein solely or in partnership, being a transaction of such a nature that, if any profits had arisen therefrom, he would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D, he may claim that the amount of the loss sustained by him shall, so far as may be, be deducted from or set-off against the amount of any profits or gains arising from any transaction in respect of which he is assessed for that year under the said case VI, and that any portion of the loss for which relief is not so given shall, as far as may be, be carried forward and deducted from or set-off against the amount of any profits or gains arising from any transaction in respect of which he is assessed under the said case VI for any of the six following years of assessment."

There was some argument on the meaning of the word "transaction" in s. 27, and it was suggested on the part of the Crown that while the taking on lease and re-letting of premises might be a "transaction," a mere failure to let leasehold premises could hardly be so described. Examples were given, such as the case of a legatee of a leasehold house who fails to find a tenant for it, or the case of the owner of a leasehold house acquired as his own residence who goes to live elsewhere and makes abortive attempts to sub-let. It was asked whether it could be said that in cases such as these there was a "transaction" from which a loss arose in the shape of the rent which had to be paid without any return from the property? The answer, I think, is that the facts supposed in the hypothetical cases put are far removed from those of the present case. As I have said above, the taxpayer here appears to have made a practice of acquiring leasehold properties with a view to making a profit by re-letting them. That being so, I think each acquisition by him of a leasehold property with this object in view, being in the nature of a business venture or investment, is on the whole rightly to be regarded as a transaction giving rise to a profit in any year in which income derived from re-letting exceeds outgoings under the superior lease and wherein he sustains a loss in any year in which the reverse is the case, whether through re-letting at an inadequate rent or through failure to re-let at all. I am at all events prepared to assume this much in the taxpayer's favour for the purposes of the present case.

The main argument centred on the question whether, given a "transaction" within the meaning of s. 27 with respect to each of the five properties in respect of which the taxpayer, within the meaning of the section, sustained a loss in the relevant year through failing to re-let at all or failing to re-let at an adequate rent, the transaction was within the meaning of the section "of such a nature that if any profits had arisen therefrom" the taxpayer "would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D."

The answer to this question depends largely on the meaning to be given to the words "loss" and "profits" in s. 27 (1) of the Act of 1927 when considered in relation to the "excess" which s. 15 of the Act of 1940 makes chargeable to tax under sched. D, case VI. It is to be observed that what s. 15 of the Act of 1940 makes chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D is not the profit made by the immediate lessor in the shape of the excess of the rent he receives over the rent he pays (in other words, his "profit" on the property for the year in the ordinary or business sense of that expression), but the excess of a notional sched. A assessment based on the rent actually received by him over whichever is the greater of two amounts, namely, (a) the actual sched. A assessment of the property, and (b) the amount of the rent paid under any short lease by the immediate lessor.

We were provided by the Crown in the course of the argument with a number of examples to show, as is, indeed, manifestly the case, that the "excess" charged with tax under the formula prescribed by s. 15 (1) bears no necessary relation to the immediate lessor's profit for the year in the ordinary or business sense (which may conveniently be termed "the commercial profit"). If the three elements in the formula are in the following ascending order of magnitude, viz. (i) rent paid by the immediate lessor under a "short" lease; (ii) notional shed. A assessment based on rent received; (iii) actual sched. A assessment; the commercial profit is represented substantially by the excess of (ii) over (i), yet there is no "excess" for the purposes of s. 15, the reason why the formula is framed so as to exclude any statutory "excess" in such a case presumably being that where the rent received, while exceeding the rent paid, is less than the actual amount of the sched. A assessment, the assessment under sched. A effectively brings into charge to tax at the standard rate the whole of the rent actually received. Again, if the items in the ascending order of magnitude are: (i) rent paid by the immediate lessor under a "short" lease; (ii) actual sched. A assessment; (iii) notional sched. A assessment, the commercial profit is represented substantially by the excess of (iii) over (i), but the statutory excess is limited to the excess of (iii) over (ii), the reason for so limiting the statutory excess presumably being that in such a case the excess of rent received over rent paid up to the actual sched. A assessment is effectively brought into charge to tax at the standard rate by means of the actual sched. A assessment. Finally, the ascending order of magnitude might be: (i) actual sched. A assessment; (ii) rent paid by the immediate lessor under a "short" lease; (iii) notional sched. A assessment. In such a case the statutory excess does, no doubt, approximate to the commercial profit, though it does not exactly coincide with such profit on account of the adjustments, and in particular the conventional allowance for repairs, involved in the notional assessment made in accordance with the rules applicable to sched. A on the basis of an annual value determined in accordance with the provisions of that schedule by reference to the rent actually received by the immediate lessor. It may be noted that in this instance the difference between the rent paid by the immediate lessor and the actual amount of the sched. A assessment would under s. 16 be brought into account against the superior landlord for the purpose of determining the excess which that section makes chargeable to tax in his hands under case VI of sched. D.

As was pointed out in the course of the argument, it is for practical purposes true to say that where the lease under which the immediate lessor holds is a "short" lease the s. 15 formula at all events produces no "excess" unless there is in fact a commercial profit, i.e., unless the rent received exceeds the rent paid. But in any case in which the rent paid exceeds the rent received the whole of the rent paid, if less than the actual sched. A assessment, is fully charged to tax at the standard rate under sched. A, while if it exceeds the actual sched. A assessment such excess is brought into account for the purpose of determining the "excess" in respect of which the superior landlord is himself made chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D by virtue of the provisions of s. 16. Moreover, it should be noted that rent payable by an immediate lessor under a long lease is ignored for the purposes of the s. 15 calculation. This I take to be because any rent payable by the immediate lessor under a long lease would be payable under deduction of tax at the standard rate by virtue of the provisions of s. 17. It appears to follow that if an immediate lessor holding under a long lease at a rent of £300 per annum let the property on short lease at a rent giving a notional sched. A assessment of £200 per annum and the actual sched. A assessment of the property was £100, there would be an "excess" under s. 15 of £100, although in fact the immediate lessor had sustained a commercial loss of £100. The immediate lessor in such a case would, I take it, be entitled under s. 17 to deduct tax at the standard rate on the £200 rent payable by him and to retain the tax on £100 of it, and would thus in fact be recouped the tax with which he was charged on the s. 15 excess. But this example, if it be right, affords yet another illustration of the absence of any necessary relation between the s. 15 excess and the commercial profit realised by the immediate lessor.

Bearing in mind these considerations as to the character of the "excess" which s. 15 of the Act of 1940 makes chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D, I return to s. 27 (1) of the Act of 1927. Does s. 15 have the effect of making the transaction of acquiring a leasehold property and re-letting it at a lower rent or failing to re-let it at all, and thereby sustaining a loss on income account, a transaction which is, within the meaning of s. 27 (1), a transaction of such a nature that, if a profit had arisen therefrom, the person concerned would have been liable to be assessed in respect thereof under case VI of sched. D? In the submission of the Crown, which has so far prevailed, s. 15 has no such effect. The word "loss" in s. 27 (1) must (it is argued) obviously mean "loss" in the ordinary commercial sense, and the word "profits", used as it is in contradistinction to "loss", must likewise mean "profits" in the ordinary commercial sense. As has been seen above, the s. 15 "excess" bears no necessary relation to commercial profit. There may be a commercial profit without any "excess," or again the "excess," if any, may be only a fraction of the commercial profit. The nature of a transaction of the kind here in question is not such as to attract tax under case VI of sched. D on any profits arising therefrom. Its nature is such that by virtue of s. 15 of the Act of 1940 it attracts tax under case VI of sched. D if, and only if (irrespective of any profit in the commercial sense), the amount of a notional sched. A assessment based on the actual rent received exceeds both the actual amount of the sched. A assessment and the amount of the rent paid by the immediate lessor under any short lease, and in such case the subject of tax is not the amount of any commercial profit but simply the excess of the amount of the notional sched. A assessment over whichever is the greater of the other two factors in the calculation prescribed by s. 15. Moreover (it is argued) the "excess," if any, cannot be said to "arise" from the transaction in the sense of being the product of the transaction like the simple commercial profit represented by the excess of rent received over rent paid. It arises by virtue of the application of the statutory formula, and is the product, not of the transaction, but of the calculation which s. 15 enjoins.

Counsel for the taxpayer argued that the word "profits" in s. 27 (1) means profits in the income tax sense, that is, taxable income of any amount which under the income tax legislation is treated as taxable income, and he referred us to a number of passages in the Acts in which the expressions "profits," "gains", and "income" are used in this sense. He invited us, therefore, to hold that inasmuch as the "excess" ascertained in accordance with s. 15 had been made by that section chargeable to tax under case VI of sched. D, it followed that, no matter how ascertained, it became "profits" for all income tax purposes, and in particular "profits" within the meaning of s. 27 (1). He supported this contention by reference to the scope of case VI of sched. D itself, which is expressed to extend to "tax in respect of any annual profits or gains not falling under any of the foregoing Cases, and not charged by virtue of any other schedule."

This reasoning enabled him in effect to substitute "excess" for "profits" in s. 27 (1) and to claim that the taxpayer was entitled to the benefit of that section with respect to the five transactions in which he had sustained "losses." He agreed, as I understood him, that "loss" in s. 27 (1) must mean "loss" in the commercial sense and not (in relation to s. 15 cases) a notional "deficiency" representing the converse of the s. 15 "excess." He contended, in effect, that there was no inconsistency in this if the "excess" computed as provided in s. 15 was regarded as the measure for income tax purposes of the actual profit, whatever it might be. He met the possible case of a commercial profit without any s. 15 excess by pointing out that liability to assessment could exist even though the statutory measure of the relevant profit might be such that the assessment was nil. He relied strongly on the apparent unfairness of the result contended for by the Crown, which meant that a man who had an "excess" on one such transaction while sustaining a loss on another would be liable to tax on the "excess" although the two transactions taken together had in fact brought him in no profit or even left him out of pocket. He pointed out that a person holding two properties under "long" leases at rents of £500 each, sub-letting one at a

A rent of £1,000 and failing to let the other at all, would under the provisions of s. 17 of the Act of 1940 be entitled, in paying his rent of £500 in the unprofitable case, to deduct and retain tax equivalent to the tax he had paid in the profitable case (i.e., tax on £500), thus in the result bearing no tax at all in respect of two transactions which taken together had brought him no profit. Counsel argued from this example that if s. 27 of the Act of 1927 did not have the effect for which he contended, the alterations in the law brought about by s. 13 to s. 18 of the Act of 1940 would involve what appeared on the face of it to be a wholly unreasonable discrimination in favour of the holders of "long" as opposed to "short" leases.

B While by no means insensible to the attractions of these arguments, I find it impossible to place on s. 27 of the Act of 1927 and s. 15 of the Act of 1940 the construction for which counsel for the taxpayer contends. I agree with the Special Commissioners and with the learned judge that the references to "loss" and "profits" in s. 27 are directed to profit and loss in the commercial sense. I also agree with them that the "excess" computed in accordance with s. 15 of the Act of 1940 in relation to a transaction of the kind here in question, bearing as it does no necessary relation to any commercial profit, is not "profits" within the meaning of s. 27 of the Act of 1927. If "any profits" (that is, commercial profits) "had arisen" from such a transaction, those profits would not necessarily have been assessable under case VI of sched. D. They might have been wholly covered by the sched. A assessment (there being no "excess"). Again, they might have been partly covered by the sched. A assessment. Substantial correspondence between the "excess" chargeable to tax under sched. D, case D VI, by virtue of s. 15 and the commercial profit arising from the transaction would only have been achieved on the assumption that the rent paid and the higher rent received both exceeded the actual amount of the sched. A assessment, and even then the liability to tax under case VI of sched. D on a figure of "excess" substantially corresponding to the commercial profit would have been due, not to the nature of the transaction, but to the inadequacy of the actual sched. A assessment in the particular case.

E The truth, as I think, is that s. 15 of the Act of 1940 is directed, not to taxation of commercial profits, but to more effective taxation of annual values. This is, to my mind, implicit in the formula adopted, with its introduction of a notional sched. A assessment based on the actual rent as an essential factor in the computation of the "excess" to be charged with tax. The use of case VI of F sched. D for the purpose of charging the "excess" with tax lends colour to the argument that s. 15 is for the first time introducing considerations of commercial profit and loss into the taxation of income derived from the ownership of land, but I agree with the submission made on behalf of the Crown that the use of this Case is mere machinery for effecting the adjustment considered necessary in the liability to tax on annual values, and should not be regarded as involving the substitution, quoad the "excess," of commercial profit for annual value as the measure of liability. As was pointed out for the Crown, this is not the only instance of recourse to assessment under case VI of sched. D for the purpose of adjusting tax liability.

G As to the distinction made by the Act of 1940 between "long" and "short" leases and the difference in the treatment accorded to them by s. 17, on the one H hand, and s. 15 and s. 16, on the other, no satisfactory explanation was advanced in argument, and I confess my own inability to provide one. But I cannot regard the anomaly suggested by counsel for the taxpayer as between cases under s. 15 and cases under s. 17 as sufficient ground for departing from the conclusion I have stated. Moreover, as it seems to me, counsel's argument would produce yet another anomaly, based on the accidental circumstance of the adequacy or inadequacy of sched. A assessments instead of the arbitrary distinction between long and short leases. A man who acquired a "short" leasehold and re-let it at a profit would be entitled to set-off against that profit losses sustained in other similar transactions if a notional sched. A assessment based on the rent he received exceeded the actual amount of the sched. A assessment, but he would have no such right if such notional sched. A assessment was less than the actual amount of the sched. A assessment, although the commercial profit represented by the excess of rent received over rent paid might in either case be precisely the same. For the reasons I have stated, being in substance the same as those which commended themselves to the Special Commissioners and the learned judge, I would, for my part, dismiss this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

R. v. WEISZ AND ANOTHER. Ex parte HECTOR MacDONALD, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Devlin, JJ.), June 19, 20, 28, 1951.]

Contempt of Court—Action prohibited by statute—Feigned issue raised by endorsement of writ—Gaming debt—Claim for account stated—Liability of solicitor.

With a view to recovering money which he alleged he had won on bets made by him with the applicants, a firm of bookmakers, W. instructed his solicitor, M., to take proceedings, although he was aware that such an action was not maintainable at law. The endorsement on the writ, which was settled by counsel and which was not seen by W., was in the following terms: "The plaintiff's claim is for the sum of £373 13s. 4d. being the balance found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff on accounts stated between them in writing and contained in a letter . . . dated Sept. 26, 1950." In fact, there never had been an account stated between the parties. The applicants moved for a writ of attachment against W. and M. on the ground that the endorsement was fictitious and merely a device to conceal from the court that the action was prohibited by the Gaming Act, 1845, and, therefore, was a contempt of court.

HELD: an action to recover money which was prohibited by statute was an abuse of the process of the court, and, although it was not necessarily a contempt of court to bring such an action, to attempt to deceive the court by disguising the true nature of the claim and putting forward a feigned issue was a contempt, and, therefore, since the endorsement was made in the name of M.'s firm and he was the partner having charge of the proceedings, although he had not seen the endorsement on the writ, the matter having been left to a managing clerk, he was guilty of contempt, but W., who was only instrumental in bringing the action and did not know of the terms of the endorsement, was not guilty.

MOTION for a writ of attachment.

- B The applicants, Hector MacDonald, Ltd., a firm of bookmakers, claimed that the respondents, Norman Weisz and Harold William Martin, his solicitor, were guilty of contempt of court in being concerned in issuing a writ in the High Court claiming a sum of money as due from the applicants to Mr. Weisz on an account stated. The grounds of the motion were that the endorsement on the writ was fictitious, that there never had been an account stated between the parties, and that the action was one to recover money won by betting which
- C was prohibited by the Gaming Act, 1845.

Cur. adv. vult.

- June 28. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. Counsel moves on behalf of the applicants, Hector MacDonald, Ltd., a company carrying on the business of bookmakers, for a writ of attachment against Mr. Norman Weisz and Mr. Harold William Martin, a solicitor, for contempt in being concerned in issuing a writ in this court claiming a sum of money as due from the applicants to Mr. Weisz on an account stated. Shortly stated, the grounds of the motion are that the endorsement was fictitious, that there never had been any account stated between the parties, and that, in fact, it was a naked claim to recover money won by betting, so that the endorsement was a device to conceal from the court the true nature of the action, which was, in truth, one prohibited by the Gaming Act, 1845.
- E The facts which it is necessary to state leading to the issue of the writ are that in the summer of 1950 Mr. Weisz claimed to have placed bets with the applicants and to have won from them some £380. This the latter disputed. We do not propose to refer to the details of the dispute as they are wholly irrelevant to the present proceedings. Suffice it to say that it was referred to Tattersalls committee which, as is well known, is the recognised tribunal for the settlement of disputes
- G between betting men, and, after both parties had attended before them, the committee decided in favour of the bookmakers. Mr. Weisz thereupon consulted his solicitor, Mr. Martin, with a view to bringing an action against the bookmakers. Mr. Martin advised him that such an action was hopeless, and, indeed, it was not disputed that Mr. Weisz knew perfectly well that such an action was not maintainable at law. However, he insisted that one should be brought, obviously
- H in the hope that the threat of publicity would induce the bookmakers to pay, or, if they did not, to "show them up". It is only fair to Mr. Martin to say that he did his best to dissuade his client from taking these proceedings, but, being reluctant to offend him by declining to act, he at length agreed and sent the correspondence to counsel with instructions to settle the endorsement for the writ. The endorsement having been received from counsel, a letter was sent to the applicants in the name of Mr. Martin's firm on Jan. 18, 1951, saying that they had been instructed and that, as it did not appear to be of any use to request payment, they were issuing a writ and asking for the name of the applicants' solicitor who would accept service. As no reply was received, a writ was issued and served on the applicants on Jan. 22. The endorsement was in these terms:

"The plaintiff's claim is for the sum of £373 13s. 4d. being the balance found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff on accounts stated between them in writing and contained in a letter from the plaintiff to the defendant dated Sept. 26, 1950. Particulars: 1950. Sept. 26. Balance due by defendant to plaintiff on this date, £373 13s. 4d. (Signed) Campbell, Hooper & Todd."

On Jan. 29 the applicants' solicitor applied for particulars of the debt or claim in respect of which the accounts were alleged to have been stated, indicating whether such debts or claims were alleged to have been on both sides or one side only. This request was acknowledged on Feb. 1, Mr. Martin's firm saying that they were getting counsel to settle the particulars and they extended the time for the defence. There seems to have been some delay in getting counsel to settle particulars, and on Feb. 14 the applicants' solicitor wrote saying that he would issue an application for particulars unless he received them in three days. On Feb. 15 the particulars were promised in a day or so, and they were received by Mr. Martin's firm from counsel on Feb. 23. Those particulars no longer attempted to disguise the nature of the claim and disclosed that the debt related to betting transactions, and counsel sent an opinion with them saying that they were fatal to Mr. Weisz's claim and would lead to it being struck out, adding: "Mr. Weisz probably knows this as well as a lawyer". The court has not been informed whether either before or after the receipt of those particulars there had been any conference with counsel, but the subsequent history is certainly somewhat curious, though it has not any direct bearing on the matter that we have to decide. Those particulars were not sent to the applicants, no doubt because they rendered the claim hopeless, and on Feb. 26 the applicants' solicitor issued and served a summons for their delivery returnable on Mar. 8. On March 1 Mr. Martin's firm wrote saying that they were sorry it should have been thought necessary to issue a summons "after our having informed you that the papers are with counsel for the purpose of settling the particulars." This is surely a very regrettable letter. The particulars had then been in their possession for a week, and it looks to the court very much as though some effort was still being made to avoid serving those fatal particulars or in some way to keep matters alive and to postpone or avoid the inevitable application to strike out the action as an abuse. Mr. Martin, through his counsel, told us that not only was he unaware of this correspondence, but that he had not even seen or been aware of the endorsement on the writ. He had, apparently, left the matter to his managing clerk, but he must, of course, take responsibility for what was done. On Mar. 6 he was shown by one of his partners an article in the LAW SOCIETY'S GAZETTE which obviously caused him anxiety. The particulars had still not been served, and, in fact, they never were, but this article caused him to consult counsel, with the result that on Mar. 7, the day before the summons for particulars was returnable, a notice of discontinuance was served.

The gravamen of the case against Mr. Martin is that the endorsement on the writ was wholly fictitious and was designed to conceal from the court the true nature of Mr. Weisz's claim. It is abundantly clear that there never had been any account stated between the parties, even in respect of betting transactions. The account is said to be contained in a letter of Sept. 26, 1950, and it is in issue whether that letter was ever sent to or received by the applicants. Assuming that it was, however, it is nothing but an allegation by Mr. Weisz that money was due to him and threatening to take proceedings to obtain it. Anything further removed from a stated account cannot well be imagined. As it was not attempted by anyone to contend that there ever was an account stated between these parties we need not deal with what is necessary to support such a cause of action. Its nature will be found fully discussed by BLACKBURN, J., in Laycock v. Pickles (1). What we have to consider does not depend in the least degree on any technical question as to the nature of an account stated. This was simply a naked action for the recovery of money alleged to have been won by betting which the Gaming Act, 1845, prohibits. Such an action is, therefore, an abuse of the process of the court, but it is not necessarily a contempt to bring it. To attempt, however, to deceive the court by disguising the true nature of the claim is a contempt. It is putting forward what the old cases called a feigned issue, that is to say, not the true, but a fictitious cause, of action. That this is a contempt is well illustrated by Coze v. Phillips (2) and Re Elsam (3). The latter case, indeed, is a strong illustration of the necessity of being frank with the court. An executor desired to obtain the opinion of the court on a question of title, a matter which in modern times would be effected by means of an originating summons, a procedure unknown in 1824 when the case was heard. Accordingly, he caused a Special Case to be stated, consisting of an elaborate story which, in fact, was wholly fictitious. His good faith was unchallenged, and it was not suggested that he had any motive other than to obtain a decision on an obscure point of law, but he was, nevertheless, fined for bringing a fictitious case before the court.

Counsel for Mr. Martin did not seek to justify the endorsement or to dispute that it, in fact, disclosed a fictitious case. He sought to mitigate what had been done, and it is, no doubt, matter of mitigation, and for myself I would say strong mitigation, that there are many cases to be found in the books in which this endorsement has been used in betting cases, and so far there has been at least no reported case in which it has been suggested that such a thing is a contempt, though the actions have been struck out as an abuse of process. Indeed, in Gugenheim v. Ladbrooke & Co., Ltd. (4), the Court of Appeal allowed the action to proceed, apparently on the ground that the plaintiff was a foreigner who would, they thought, not understand the position and be aggrieved if the action were to be summarily dismissed, and this in spite of the great doubt expressed by TUCKER, L.J., as to this course being allowed. I think that case should be regarded as wholly exceptional. It does appear from its subsequent history that a very serious issue of fraud had been raised which the foreign plaintiff was anxious to have determined, and when the case came to trial before HUMPHREYS, J., the judge allowed that issue to be left to a jury, though he entered judgment against the plaintiff on the ground that it was a betting claim and without regard to the verdict.

The very fact that on many previous occasions resort has been had to this particular form of endorsement in cases which are brought simply for the recovery of money won at betting or gaming is what gives importance to this present motion. It is time that this practice should be stopped, and in no uncertain manner. The mischief is obvious. Parliament has ordained that the courts are not to be used for this purpose. Many people may be deterred from defending such actions, if brought, for fear of publicity. If the writ were truthfully endorsed, for money won at betting, it would be wholly improper to allow a default judgment to be entered. The duty of the Central Office would be to bring the matter before the practice master, and he, in his turn, ought not, and I am sure would not, allow a judgment to be signed which would, in effect, be contrary to the provisions of the statute. If a writ is endorsed for a fictitious, but apparently legal, cause of action, a default judgment could be signed, as of course, and, accordingly, in our opinion, this leads to an interference with or distortion of the course of justice.

In this connection I ought to refer to the extract from the March, 1951, issue of the LAW SOCIETY'S GAZETTE exhibited to Mr. Martin's affidavit, in which it is stated at p. 105 that, if a defendant to proceedings issued in respect of a gaming debt is to succeed, the statute must be pleaded, and Willis v. Lovick (5) is cited as authority. This is too wide a statement. The true rule is to be found in North Western Salt Co., Ltd. v. Electrolytic Alkali Co., Ltd. (6), and is succinctly stated in the headnote, thus:

"Where an action is brought on a contract which is ex facie illegal . . . the court will decline to enforce the contract . . . whether illegality is pleaded or not; but, where the question of illegality depends upon the surrounding circumstances, as a general rule, the court will not entertain the question unless it is raised by the pleadings."

SCRUTTON, L.J., put it tersely in Phillips v. Copping (7) ([1935] 1 K.B. 21), saying:

" . . . it is the duty of the court when asked to give a judgment which is contrary to a statute to take the point although the litigants may not take it."

Willis v. Lovick (5) was an illustration of the second part of the rule stated in the North Western Salt Co., Ltd. case (6). In Willis v. Lovick (5) an agent sued his principal for commission on money received by the principal from persons introduced by the agent. The court held that if the defendant wished to say that the money had been received from persons betting with the defendant the Gaming Act, 1892, must be pleaded. Phillips v. Copping (7), however, shows that if A sues B for money won by betting it is the duty of the court to refuse to give judgment for him as soon as it appears that the action is one prohibited by the Gaming Acts, whether or not the Acts are pleaded, and this shows how important it is that the claim should not be preferred under a feigned issue.

We do not think it necessary to go through the many cases cited in argument dealing with contempts of different kinds, nor is it necessary to remind the court that the summary jurisdiction to punish contempts is one to be exercised with caution. It is, in our opinion, beyond question that to disguise a cause of action so as to conceal its true nature, when, in truth, it is one prohibited by statute, is a contempt, and, as the endorsement here was signed in the name of Mr. Martin's firm, and he admits that he was the partner having charge of the proceedings, he must take responsibility and be held guilty of a contempt.

I now turn to the position of the respondent Weisz. The court accepts his evidence that he was abroad when the writ was actually issued and that he did not know of its terms. That he insisted on an action being brought which was an abuse of the process of the court is clear, and as it is admitted that he knew that betting debts could not be recovered by action it follows that he knew that the action for which he gave instructions was an abuse. It has never yet been held, however, that merely to bring, or cause to be brought, an action which is an abuse can be treated as a contempt, even though it may have been brought for the purpose of pressure or what may be called "showing up." If it were held that to bring an action prohibited by the Gaming Acts was punishable, it would mean that the court was treating as criminal something for which Parliament had not provided a penalty. As a general rule stopping the action in limine and awarding costs against the plaintiff must be regarded as the appropriate sanction. There may be exceptions, and, to give one instance, if a person who brought an action which was struck out as an abuse again brought exactly the same action, the court might deal with him for contempt, but that would be because his conduct in bringing the second action amounted to a defiance of the court. It is necessary to emphasise that the contempt in the present case lies, not in bringing an action forbidden by the Gaming Acts, but in bringing it as a feigned issue so as to conceal its true nature from the court. For this we cannot hold Mr. Weisz responsible. He instructed his solicitor to bring an action for the bets. Had the writ been endorsed for money due to the plaintiff on bets won by him the action would have been struck out, but it would not have amounted to contempt.

We have now to consider what penalty, if any, should be imposed on Mr. Martin. We do not overlook the fact that he sent the papers to counsel who settled the endorsement. We have not been asked to hear any application against counsel, and, therefore, only say this. No doubt, had counsel been asked to explain his action he would have said, as Mr. Martin has said, that this form of endorsement has been often used in these cases without it ever having been said to be a contempt, and he might well have pointed particularly to Gugenheim v. Ladbrooke & Co., Ltd. (4). We recognise there is considerable force in this, and, as we have already said, in regard to Mr. Martin, it ought to be regarded as strong mitigation. We hope, however, that counsel as well as solicitors will always bear in mind that they owe a duty to the court as well as to their clients, and that a main object in requiring the signature of counsel or a solicitor to pleadings settled by them is to prevent issues, whether called feigned or fictitious, being presented to the court. Henceforward there will be no excuse for using this form of endorsement, or, we would add, one such as "money due under a contract in writing made between the parties" when the claim is simply in respect of gaming or wagering. While holding Mr. Martin guilty of a contempt, we acquit him of any intention to act in contempt of the court, and he has, by his counsel, offered a full apology. We, therefore, impose no penalty on him. No order for attachment.

NOTE.

BROOKSBANK v. J. L. RAWSTHORNE & CO. (a firm).
[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Morris, L.J.J., and Harman, J.), June 25, 1951.]

Court of Appeal—Reinstatement of dismissed appeal—No appearance of appellant—Appeal dismissed with costs—Application to reinstate—Jurisdiction.

MOTION to set aside an order of the Court of Appeal dated May 30, 1951. On May 29, 1951, an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of LYNSEY, J., made at Liverpool Assizes on November 10, 1950, was called on, but, the appellant having failed to appear, the appeal was dismissed with costs, the court directing that the order should not be drawn up until the following day to give the appellant an opportunity to communicate with the court. The case had been included in the cause list on five days before the day on which it was called on. The appellant now moved for the appeal to be reinstated. The defendants opposed the motion, contending that the appeal had been heard and determined within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 27 (1), and that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the application.

Re MACLAREN'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE v. MACLAREN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), June 7, 12, 13, 28, 1951.]

Settlement—Capital or income—Tenant for life and remainderman—Apportionment—Capital profits dividend—Profit on sale of company's assets—Application of dividend with other funds in purchase of house—Right of tenant for life to equitable charge on house.

On Nov. 8, 1948, Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd., announced that, having sold their interests in road transport to the British Transport Commission in consideration of the allotment of a large holding of British Transport three per cent. stock, they would pay to stockholders as a special capital profits dividend £5 of transport stock in respect of every unit of stock of Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd., held. On Nov. 20, 1948, the trustees of a settlement, having wide powers of investment with the consent of the tenant for life, proposed to the tenant for life that certain capital moneys should be invested in the purchase of stock of Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd. The tenant for life agreed, and on Dec. 1, 1948, the purchase was effected. In March, 1949, Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd., distributed the British Transport stock as proposed. The trustees later sold both the Thomas Tilling stock and the British Transport stock, receiving in the aggregate for both holdings less than the amount of capital moneys originally invested in Thomas Tilling stock. The proceeds were applied (under a power given by the settlement) together with other capital moneys in the purchase of a house as a residence for the tenant for life. In reliance on the decision in Re Sechiari ([1950] 1 All E.R. 417) the tenant for life claimed to be entitled to an equitable charge on the house or the proceeds of its sale of an amount equivalent to the proceeds of sale of the British Transport stock.

HELD: the tenant for life had assented to the purchase of the transport stock as a capital investment and to the sale of that stock and the re-investment of the proceeds as capital in real estate for his benefit knowing that the trustees would not have embarked on the transaction if they had been aware of the possibility that the capital distribution by Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd. would be income in their hands, and, in the circumstances, there was no equity in the tenant for life that he should be given a charge on the house or its proceeds of sale or be recouped the value of the transport stock.

Per curiam: The jurisdiction exercised in special circumstances to apportion between capital and income seems to be only the exercise of a right to make a more exact distinction of income from capital. As a matter of convenience, the practice is in the ordinary case that no apportionments are made, with the result that capital sometimes gets what, on a more exact scrutiny, would prove to be income and vice versa. Where this produces a glaring injustice, the court will cause a more exact calculation to be made, but it does not treat as income that which is capital, or as capital that which is income.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the true construction of the trusts of a settlement and in the events which had happened the tenant for life was entitled to an equitable charge on a dwelling-house, or the proceeds of sale thereof, of an amount equivalent to the proceeds of sale of a holding of British Transport stock received by the trustees as a capital profits dividend as the holders of ordinary stock of Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd., which proceeds of sale had been used by the trustees (together with capital moneys) in the purchase of the said dwelling-house.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 28. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. William Frederick de Bois Maclaren, the settlor in this matter, by an indenture of Nov. 18, 1919, made between himself and a bank as trustee, after reciting that he was desirous of making a settlement for the primary benefit of his nephew, the first defendant, and that he had for that purpose transferred, or was about to transfer, into the name of the trustee certain securities specified in the schedule, provided that the trustee should either retain or sell the securities, and should with the consent of the nephew invest the proceeds in manner thereafter authorised, and stand possessed of the trust fund on trust to pay the income to the nephew during his life (with power to him after his death to appoint the income to his widow) and in remainder for his children or issue as there provided, with divers gifts over under which, in the events which have happened, the only persons at present interested in the corpus of the fund are the remaining defendants, or some of them.

The settlement contained a clause imposing protective trusts on any income beneficiary, and the trustee was empowered to invest moneys in its hands in "the ordinary or other stock or fully paid shares . . . of any . . . public company in the United Kingdom . . . or in the purchase . . . of freehold property," and in other ways not here relevant. The trustee was empowered to allow any tenant for life to occupy any purchased hereditaments rent free. Clause 9 of the settlement empowered the trustee among other things "to distinguish trust funds and capital from income to settle questions of fact law or equity and to determine the special object of any trust and the value of any property and [its] decisions shall be binding on all parties interested."

Clause 10 empowered the trustee to employ and pay professional persons. Clause 11 conferred on the bank as trustee certain powers to delegate its duties and to take remuneration. This last clause does not apply to the plaintiffs, who are now trustees of the settlement, having been appointed so to act in 1945.

As the result of the sale of a house purchased as a residence for the first defendant under the powers in the settlement, the plaintiffs had in their hands, in November, 1948, a sum of rather less than £4,000 of capital moneys due to be invested, and they, taking the view that part of the funds should be invested in gilt-edged securities were on the look out for an advantageous investment of that kind for a part of the available moneys. At this time the plaintiffs through their officers became aware of a proposal then recently made by the chairman of Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd., which is contained in a document dated Nov. 8, 1948. By this document the chairman of that company announced the conclusion by his company of an agreement with the British Transport Commission for the sale to the commission of the company's interests in road transport, passenger and haulage undertakings. The consideration for this sale was a very large sum to be satisfied by the allotment of British Transport guaranteed stock 1958-73 at 101 per cent., the current price of that stock on the previous Sept. 30. The announcement went on to disclose that the company proposed to call a meeting to sanction the issue on Apr. 1, 1949, among the shareholders by way of what was called capital distribution of £5 of British Transport stock in respect of each £1 of the company's stock held. The plaintiffs' officers were advised (or conceived the notion) that a purchase of Thomas Tilling stock in these circumstances would, if the proposals went through, result in the acquisition by the trust of British Transport stock at less than the price at which that stock could then be bought in the open market, and they determined to embark on this speculation and by a letter of Nov. 20, 1948, wrote to the first defendant to obtain his consent. The relevant part of this letter reads as follows:

"I would suggest that these moneys be invested in two hundred Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd., ordinary stock units of £1 each at £6 2s. 3d., £1,000 British Controlled Oilfields 4½ per cent. secured loan stock 1953-58 at 102, one thousand Powell Duffryn & Co., Ltd., 4½ per cent. preference shares at 22s. 6d., and the balance can be added to British Transport three per cent. guaranteed stock 1978-88 at 101 cum the January dividend. Thomas Tilling & Co. have, as you know, recently announced that they will pay out to stockholders £5 of British Transport three per cent. wagon stock, which stands at 101, for every share held, and that the company will remain in being as a holding company of their various other investments. It is considered that when this takes place, a dividend of five per cent. can be paid on the company's shares and that the assets will be worth more than the market price."

The first defendant did not answer this letter in writing, but he had a conversation on the telephone with the officer concerned as a result of which he agreed to the purchase of £350 of Thomas Tilling stock, and this purchase was effected as appears by letter written to him by the plaintiffs on Dec. 1, 1948. The price paid was, apparently, £6 2s. 3d. per unit, and the total cost £2,193 16s. 9d. In accordance with its chairman's proposals, a meeting of Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd., was held on Mar. 17, 1949, the result of which was that a resolution was passed in accordance with his proposals, and the plaintiffs, before the end of that month, received in respect of their holding of £350 ordinary stock of the company £1,750 of British Transport stock.

To complete the facts, the two stocks, viz., the Thomas Tilling ordinary stock and the British Transport stock were, in the course of 1949, sold with the nephew's consent for sums of £391 9s. 3d. and £1,642 8s. 3d. This, on the footing that both were capital, showed a capital loss of about £160. If, however, as is now claimed, the transport stock be income, the loss of capital was over £1,800. The aggregate proceeds, together with other capital cash, were at the nephew's request applied in the purchase of a freehold property as his residence, the cost being £5,750. The value of the other capital assets of the trust is about £11,200.

In 1950 Re Sechiari (1) was decided. In that case, ROMER, J., decided that the British Transport stock distributed in pursuance of the resolution by Thomas Tilling & Co., Ltd., to which I have referred was, as between tenant for life and remaindermen under a settlement made by will, income and not capital, and was

- A prima facie payable to the tenant for life. The learned judge reserved by his order the question whether, in the circumstances of that case, the court had or would exercise in the execution of the trust any jurisdiction to apportion the dividend (that is to say, the British Transport stock) on equitable principles between income and capital. No steps, so far as I know, have hitherto been taken by the remaindermen to take advantage of that reservation, but it suggests
- B that there are or may be circumstances in which the court has power to make an apportionment which would do justice between tenant for life and remaindermen. The questions in this case are whether the jurisdiction exists, and if so whether it ought to be exercised in the circumstances I have recited. I may add that in Re Sechiari (1) the Thomas Tilling stock had been acquired a number of years before the distribution, and that no circumstances existed such as I have
- C rehearsed in the present case.

The argument of counsel for the tenant for life has the merit of simplicity. His client was, at the time when this sum of transport stock came into the hands of the trustees of the settlement, entitled to the income. The stock has been held to be income, and, therefore, it is payable to the tenant for life. On the face of it, that is the result of the transaction, and, not unnaturally, perhaps, the tenant

D for life, on seeing a report of the Sechiari case (1), sought to apply it to himself, but, as the transport stock had been sold in 1949 and the proceeds applied towards the purchase of a house, he is driven to claim an equitable charge on that house or the proceeds of its sale. The remaindermen, equally naturally, protest that this would work a monstrous injustice on them.

- E The first question is whether, in the circumstances of the present case, the tenant for life can make good his claim. Secondly, arises the question whether a court of equity, in executing a trust, has an overriding jurisdiction in pursuance of its duty of holding the balance fairly between capital and income to prevent a result which, on the face of it, seems to work an injustice to the remaindermen even if this involves treating income as capital. I should here mention that the
- F plaintiffs alleged that cl. 9 of the settlement empowered them to allocate this stock to capital and that they had exercised this power, but at the hearing they wholly failed to prove any proper exercise of this discretion, if it existed, and their counsel abandoned the point.

To decide the first question, I must add something to the facts above stated. Mr. Bidwell, the manager of the plaintiffs, was cross-examined before me, and he

- G deposed that his intention in the transaction was to acquire the transport stock on favourable terms as an investment. I interpret his statement to mean that the object of the transaction was to acquire the transport stock as an investment of capital, and that the acquisition of the Thomas Tilling stock was really a means to that end. The tenant for life was also cross-examined, and in substance he agreed with this view. He told me that he appreciated that the object of the purchase was to acquire the British Transport stock at a discount, and that he
- H agreed to the purchase as a capital investment. He further said that when the stock was sold, he consented to its sale on the footing that it was capital. To this I add that it must have been applied towards the purchase of the house in 1949 on that footing. In these circumstances, I ask myself what equity there can be in the tenant for life that he should be given a charge on this property. He consented to the whole transaction on the footing that it was a capital transaction, well knowing that the trustees would never have embarked on it if they had appreciated its possible results, and, in my judgment, the short answer is that he has no claim to this charge or to be recouped the value of the transport stock, even though in other circumstances it may be (and I decide nothing about this) that he might properly claim it as income. This rests, not on an estoppel, because the elements of estoppel are not here present, but on the fact that the transaction was in substance the purchase with capital moneys of British Transport stock as a capital investment. That the trustees should have been willing to lend themselves to this kind of transaction seems to me a comment on their prudence, but I cannot think that the wisdom or otherwise of the step they took can result in a windfall for the tenant for life which neither they intended nor he expected. A

This would be enough to decide the question, but, as the broader consideration of the equitable jurisdiction of the court in administration proceedings has been argued at some length, I think I should express a view on it. Counsel for the remaindermen submitted that there is a power in the court in administration proceedings to declare that what ex facie is income is, in truth, capital, and vice versa. He admits that this power can be exercised only in exceptional circumstances. What those were, he did not venture to say, but he submitted that these circumstances (if any) are exceptional having regard to the facts I have last recited. He also submitted to me that, if this project had been known to the remaindermen before it was carried out and its result appreciated, they could have obtained an injunction to restrain the trustees from so unfair an exercise of their powers. I do not find this submission helpful for these reasons: First, the plaintiffs, if they had realised the result, would never have embarked on the transaction. Secondly, if they had done so with their eyes open, then I think it likely that they could have been restrained on the footing that they were committing a breach of trust and were not properly exercising their discretion as to investing the fund. Questions of breach of trust, however, cannot be raised in these proceedings, and I say no more about them. B C D

In support of his main submission counsel cited to me a series of cases beginning with Countess (Dowager) Plymouth v. Lady (Dowager) Archer (2). This was a decision of LORD THURLOW, L.C., and, as I read it, turned in fact on the true construction of the words "rents and profits" contained in a devise by will. In that case the person for whose benefit lands were to be purchased, and to whose use they were to be assured for his life without impeachment of waste so that he could cut timber for his own benefit, was restrained from cutting timber on certain land held on trust for sale although the rents and profits of that land were limited to the use of the same person who would be entitled to the lands to be bought. Rents and profits, according to LORD THURLOW, should not be held to include anything but annual profits and must exclude, therefore, the cutting of the timber because that would entitle the tenant for life to commit double waste. In my judgment, that case did not purport to vary in favour of capital something which ex facie was income, but merely construed the will. It is, however, fair to say that in subsequent cases it has been treated as deciding more than that. E F

Burges v. Lamb (3), a decision of LORD ELDON, L.C., merely decided that on the facts the tenant for life could not be restrained from cutting timber. It was complicated by the fact that the person claiming to be entitled to the timber was also one of the trustees. LORD ELDON did, however, refer to LORD THURLOW's case in making the following observations (16 Ves. 187): G

"The principle of such a bill is therefore driven to this: that, when the proportion, that such a tenant for life is to have, can be ascertained, all the excess beyond that ought to be removed from the estate; and laid out in that species of subject, that ought to be purchased, not hereafter, but now; as the increase hereafter will give the tenant for life the proper subject and value, when his estate comes into possession; not leaving him open to the variation of the price of timber and other accidents. In the present state of the record therefore this injunction is not to be maintained. Another object also deserves attention. The court, taking care, that the fund shall H

A be laid out, as LORD THURLOW says, according to a reasonable and sound execution of the trust, must not on the other hand place trustees in such difficulties, that they never can execute a trust of this sort without coming to a court of equity. Here are several tenants for life unimpeachable for waste; and it is very difficult to hit the ratio: but, if the timber bears a very considerable proportion to the value of the whole purchase, the tenant for life, especially as he is one of the trustees, cannot possibly be permitted to take it. The court may be driven to take this course; that trustees, laying out the fund in a timbered estate, without applying that reasonable and discreet attention, that in a fair view ought to be applied to the interests of all parties, should be considered in a court of equity as not buying any timber for their own benefit. That is a mode of cutting the knot, which perhaps in a new and difficult case might be adopted: but, without determining, what might be the decision upon such a case, my opinion is, that upon this bill the injunction cannot be maintained."

B I cannot derive much help from this.

C In Lord Londesborough v. Somerville (4) the plaintiff, being tenant for life of a very large sum in consols which were sold in exercise of a trust to invest in real estate, claimed part of the purchase price of the consols on the ground that they were sold at a time just before the dividend became due, and in such a way that he would be deprived of all income over a very considerable period. SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., says (19 Beav. 298):

D "I think the tenant for life is entitled to something in respect of thees dividends. Cases have occurred frequently, showing the principle and view which equity takes of cases of this description. They rest upon the broad and general principle of doing justice between the tenant for life and the persons entitled to an estate in remainder, but which, as was observed by LORD ELDON in Burges v. Lamb (3) (16 Ves. 177), in some cases, involve matters of 'much importance and difficulty'."

E Later, the learned Master of the Rolls says (ibid., 299):

F "The price of the stock, exclusive of the dividend, appears to me to be the capital, and the amount by which it was augmented by the dividend appears to me to be the income which belonged to the tenant for life, who is fairly entitled to receive it. If he does not receive it, the effect will be, that part of the purchase money for the corpus of an estate will be paid out of the income of the tenant for life, by which the remaindermen will gain an undue advantage."

G This was merely a case where the court departed from the general rule, which is only a rule of convenience, that there should be no apportionment between capital and income on sales of stock either cum dividend or ex dividend. It did not purport to treat capital as income or vice versa.

H To a similar effect is Bulkeley v. Stephens (5), decided by SIR JOHN STUART, V.-C., in 1864. The learned Vice-Chancellor made these observations (10 L.T. 229):

"... ordinarily, the court never makes an inquiry of this kind where there is a sale of three per cents. to invest in bank stock or any other security; the equity between the tenant for life and the remaindermen upon the sale of one kind of stock and the investment of the proceeds in another kind of stock, with a current dividend upon what is sold and upon what is bought, makes a sort of equation, and the court is never asked to enter upon the question. But what has that to do with the case where the sale is made under the authority of the court in the exercise of a discretion given by the will—that is to say, a discretion submitted to the court—where the sale of stock, during the currency of a dividend, is made for the purpose, not of investing in another stock, but of laying it out in mortgage? The equities between the tenant for life and the remaindermen are very plain ”.

And then the learned Vice-Chancellor says that in the special circumstances of that case, the sale having been made by the order of the court, the court would see to it that neither party lost or gained by what was done.

The next case is also reported under the title Bulkeley v. Stephens (6). Here, again, the court departed from the general rule in a special case, and STIRLING, J., said ([1896] 2 Ch. 249):

“ Looking at all these circumstances, I am not prepared to introduce any novel practice applicable to the sale of shares in the ordinary course of the execution of a trust consequent on the death of a tenant for life. It has, however, been held that, even in such cases as were dealt with by KINDERSLEY, V.-C., effect may be given to the right claimed under special circumstances.”

Then the learned judge refers to Lord Londesborough v. Somerville (4) and Bulkeley v. Stephens (5). That case on its facts is the converse of the present one. The tenant for life only consented to the sale with a reservation of her claim to the dividend, and could not, therefore, be deprived of it. The tenant for life here made no such reservation.

In Re Winterstoke's Will Trusts (7) CLAUSON, J., with a view to preserving the rights between tenant for life and remaindermen, declared ([1937] 4 All E.R. 68) that the trustees ought not to treat the whole of the purchase price of shares as capital, but to apportion it in a certain way between capital and income. In the later case of Re Firth (8) that case was criticised by FARWELL, J., who said that only very special circumstances would justify the process applied by CLAUSON, J. The learned judge found no such circumstances in that case.

The court can, then, in special circumstances apportion between capital and income on sales or purchases of stock cum dividend or ex dividend, although it is not the practice to do so in the ordinary way because the various persons interested under settlements ought to take the rough with the smooth, and in order to ease the burden falling on trustees. The jurisdiction, however, exercised in special circumstances seems to be only the exercise of a right to make a more exact distinction of income from capital. As a matter of convenience, the practice is in the ordinary case that no apportionments are made, with the result that capital sometimes gets what, on a more exact scrutiny, would prove to be income and vice versa. Where this produces a glaring injustice, the court will cause a more exact calculation to be made, but it does not treat as income that which is capital, or as capital that which is income. In my judgment, therefore, the cases cited by counsel for the remaindermen do not justify the submission he sought to rest on them.

I understand that VAISEY, J., recently decided another case arising out of this Thomas Tilling transaction (Re Kleinwort's Settlement Trusts (9)) and held that the circumstances there before him did not warrant an apportionment. It was admitted before him that there was a jurisdiction to apportion in a proper case, but he expressed the view in a tentative way that its exercise was really confined to cases of breach of trust. This, I think, may well be the answer. It seems to me clear that the court would never allow the beneficial rights to be altered by a breach of trust, and if the circumstances were such that a purchase by trustees (of the Thomas Tilling shares, for instance, with a knowledge of the possible or probable results) would have been a breach, the court might well apportion the so-called dividend or allocate it to capital even though in fact the trustees did not realise what they were doing when they did it. In the present case, I have not to decide that question on the view I take of the facts. Regarding them as I do, I must hold that the tenant for life has no claim here to any part of the British Transport stock for two reasons: first, that he assented to its purchase as a capital investment, and secondly, that he assented to its sale and re-investment as capital in real estate for his benefit. In these circumstances, I hold that the stock in this trust and the proceeds of its sale have assumed the guise of capital, and must be retained as such, and that no question of apportionment arises.

Order accordingly.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), June 22, 29, 1951.]

Costs—Charity—Gift to non-existent charity—Claims by various charities—Construction of will—Right to costs out of the estate.

By his will, a testator gave his residuary estate to his trustees on trust to sell the same and stand possessed of the proceeds, after payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies, on trust "to pay the same unto the widows and orphans fund of the Royal Merchant Navy." There being no institution bearing the name indicated, the trustees made inquiries and approached various charities which provided for seamen and their families. A number of charities so approached indicated a desire to claim the residuary estate and were joined as defendants in an originating summons issued by the trustees to determine the construction of the will. The court held that none of the claimants had a remote chance of establishing its claim and that the hopelessness of the claims should have been apparent after perusal of the evidence in support of the summons. On the question of costs,

HELD: the charities, though entitled to file evidence and argue in support of their claims, were not entitled to do so at the expense of the estate after it had become clear that their claims were hopeless, and, therefore, their costs (as between solicitor and client) would be paid out of the estate only down to and including perusal of the affidavit in support of the summons, and no order as to their costs thereafter would be made.

VAISEY, J., held that the matter should be referred to chambers for the settlement of a scheme. The case is reported on the question of costs,

I. G. H. Campbell for the plaintiffs, the executors of the will.

M. J. Albery for the first defendant, the Port of Hull Society's Sailors' Orphans Homes.

Newsom for the second defendant, the Royal Alfred Aged Merchant Seamen's Institution.

A. F. M. Berkeley for the third defendant, the Mercantile Marine Service Association.

Rawlence for the fourth defendant, the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Royal Benevolent Society.

Plowman for other defendants, next of kin.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The testator, George Edward Preston, lived in Coventry and was a retired butcher. He appears to have been interested in the merchant navy. By his will, dated June 28, 1948, after appointing the plaintiffs to be executors and trustees thereof, he bequeathed a number of pecuniary and other legacies and gave the residue of his estate to his trustees on trust for sale and directed them to stand possessed thereof (after payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies) on trust (I now quote the words of the will) "to pay the same unto the widows and orphans fund of the Royal Merchant Navy." He died on Jan. 17, 1949. His will was proved by the plaintiffs on Apr. 7, 1949. The value of the ultimate residue which he purported to dispose of by the words which I have quoted, is about £8,500.

The plaintiffs, having failed to find any institution or body of persons having the name of "the widows and orphans fund of the Royal Merchant Navy," set inquiries on foot to discover what other charities there were with names resembling the words in the will which I have mentioned, or carrying on activities of the nature indicated by those words. The result of those inquiries was to bring to the notice of the plaintiffs the following institutions, which it is convenient for me to designate by serial numbers as follows: (1) The Port of Hull Society's Sailors' Orphans Homes; (2) The Royal Alfred Aged Merchant Seamen's Institution; (3) Mercantile Marine Service Association; (4) The Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Royal Benevolent Society; (5) The Shetland Fishermen's Widows Relief Fund; and (6) Admiral of the Fleet Sir Frederick Richards Memorial Fund. Letters were sent by the plaintiffs to each of these institutions asking whether they wished to make a claim to the testator's residuary estate. As a result, claims were put forward by Nos. (1) to (5) inclusive. On behalf of No. (6) it was intimated that it did not wish to make a claim. Thereupon Nos. (1) to (5) or persons representing them respectively were joined as defendants to the present summons, which was issued on Oct. 10, 1949, in order to have it determined whether the gift to the widows and orphans fund of the Royal Merchant Navy operates as or is a gift to any of the said bodies or institutions Nos. (1) to (5), or to some other and if so what body or institution, or, alternatively, whether the gift should be regulated by a scheme, or in the further alternative, lapsed, and if necessary for an inquiry what institution or body of persons is referred to by the words of the will, and it asks that the costs may be provided for. The plaintiffs did not, as they might have done, though it was not incumbent on them to do so, warn the defendants Nos. (1) to (5) that if they wished to appear as parties to the application it must be at their own risk as to costs.

The Shetland Fishermen's Widows Relief Fund, No. (5), very prudently withdrew from the proceedings at an early stage, filed no evidence, and did not appear by counsel at the hearing, but each of Nos. (1) to (4) did file evidence to support its claim to be the institution indicated in the will, and argued its case by counsel, or attempted to do so, at the hearing. Not one of them, in my judgment, came anywhere near establishing a case. None of their names bears

A any similarity whatsoever to the words used in the will, and there is no ground for supposing that the testator had ever heard of any of them, or that any of them had ever heard of him. There is, I think, really nothing to choose between them: all are equally "out of the picture." I am satisfied on the evidence that there is, in fact, no institution or body of persons which can be said to be identifiable with the testator's descriptive words, and no inquiry on the point is necessary. Nor is this a case, such as Re Alchin's Trusts (1), in which I could hold that the testator must have intended to refer to one or other of the claiming institutions although I cannot say which. The matter seems to me to lie between the Attorney-General, who (relying on cases such as Re Davis (2)) submits that the words import a general charitable intent and asks for a scheme to give effect to that intent, and the testator's statutory next of kin who submit that the residuary estate is undisposed of. I reject the submission of the next of kin and accede to the Attorney-General's argument, and I will make an order accordingly.

B The only difficulty in the case is as to the costs of the application. Obviously the plaintiffs' costs taxed as between solicitor and client must be raised out of the estate in a due course of administration and the costs of the Attorney-General and the next of kin, between whom there was a serious point to be argued, must be similarly taxed and raised. What order ought I to make as regards the costs of the institutions Nos. (1) to (5)? Each of those Nos. (1) to (4)—I can disregard for the moment No. (5)—has argued that it is entitled to have the whole of its costs paid out of the estate, irrespective of the merits or absence of merits of its case, by the mere fact of having been joined as a defendant to the proceedings. I do not agree, particularly when I recall that it had already put forward its claim when the summons was issued, in contrast to No. (6) which deliberately refrained from doing so. Each of them, Nos. (1) to (5), in fact was joined at its own request, with a view, no doubt, to establishing, if it could, its identity with the institution designated by the words of the will. To No. (5) a discreet withdrawal appeared to be preferable to the advocacy of a hopeless cause. Now, of course, every case must depend to some extent on its own facts. For example, where a party has requested to be made a defendant to proceedings which but for that request would have been wholly unnecessary, he might be ordered to pay the whole of the costs himself: see Re Buckton (3) ([1907] 2 Ch. 415). Again, where such a request is wholly without justification he might well be made to pay the whole of his own costs and any other costs occasioned by his intervention. In the present instance, I think the test is this: "When ought the parties Nos. (1) to (5) to have discovered the utter hopelessness of their respective cases?", and I think that this should have been quite apparent to them at the very latest on perusal of the evidence filed in support of the summons. From that point onwards they were, in my judgment, bound to go on, if they wished to go on at all, at their own expense and risk. In other cases, the discovery might not have been complete until the parties had perused the whole of the evidence, but here I think the position was abundantly clear from the affidavit of the plaintiff, William Ernest Raby, filed Oct. 19, 1949. I do not for a moment dispute the right of each of the parties to file evidence and argue, however hopelessly, in support of its supposed claim; the only question is whether other parties should be asked to pay them for doing so. It may be regretted that the matter has not so far been adequately dealt with in any reported case, but in "The Times" newspaper of Jan. 14, 1932, the following paragraph appeared:

"FARWELL, J., on the hearing of an originating summons yesterday for the determination of the question whether any and what charitable society was entitled to a charitable bequest where no such charitable society as that named in the will actually existed, stated, on the suggestion of Mr. Stafford Crossman, who appeared for the Attorney-General, that in such a case a society who appeared in court to support a claim which was not admitted must not expect as a right to be paid its costs out of the estate and might in certain events have to pay costs."

I am informed by counsel for the Attorney-General that the name of that case was Re Millington (4). He also informs me that in another case, Re Clara Jones (5), where there was a gift "to cancer research," DANCKWERTS, J., on Nov. 30, 1949, refused to make any order as to the costs of the first three defendants, namely, the British Empire Cancer Campaign, the Imperial Cancer Research Fund, and the Christie Hospital.

It was suggested that the defendants Nos. (1) to (4) were justified in coming forward at the hearing in order to establish their claim to participate under any scheme to give effect to a general charitable intent if such were held to be the true effect of the will. I do not assent to that. Any of those defendants could, when intimating (as did the Shetland Fishermen) the withdrawal of their claim to the whole fund, state that they would wish their claims to be considered in the event of a scheme being formulated. A similar request was made by another institution, not a party to these proceedings, viz., the Royal Merchant Navy School. But a scheme would not necessarily have included any of those defendants. It might, for example, provide for the setting up of a new independent organisation and the idea that any and every claimant to an imaginary identity with a mis-described institution has a sort of secondary right to come in as a participant under a hypothetical scheme is not one to be encouraged, at any rate not by giving such a claimant any costs. The truth is that these defendants Nos. (1) to (4) have really not assisted me at all. They have merely put forward propositions of a most unsubstantial character in the hope of benefitting themselves. I do not complain of that, but I really do not see why their costs of doing so should be paid by anyone but themselves.

The order will provide for the taxation as between solicitor and client and payment out of the estate of the costs of the respective defendants Nos. (1) to (5) of entering appearances to the summons, and any other costs which they may have incurred down to and including the perusal by them respectively of Mr. Raby's affidavit, but as to their subsequent costs I make no order. Each of such defendant institutions must, therefore, bear its own costs of preparing and filing the evidence in support of its own claim and perusing the evidence of the other defendants, and also, of course, the costs of any attendances in chambers and of appearing at the hearing before me. I hope that attention will be paid to what I have said in this judgment. It involves no new principle, but one which is well supported by the two cases which I have mentioned, and also, I know, by other similar cases of which no record has been preserved. There is nothing in that principle which conflicts in any way with the decision in Re Buckton (3) or with any of the propositions laid down in that case.

Order accordingly.

Re PAYTON (deceased). PAYTON v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Lord Radcliffe, and Denning, L.J.), May 30, 31, June 1, July 2, 1951.]

Estate Duty—Passing—Property deemed to pass—Beneficial interest—Interest provided by deceased by arrangement with employer—Pension payable to deceased and on his death to his widow—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 1, s. 2 (1) (d).

In 1933 a company entered into a contract or policy of assurance with an assurance society to provide, inter alia, pensions for employees after retirement from service. By virtue of the policy an employee became entitled to a pension on his "normal pension date," i.e., on the anniversary of the date of commencement of his membership of the scheme which fell nearest to the date of his attainment of the age of sixty-five years. The amount of the pension was ascertained in accordance with a table annexed to the policy by reference to length of service with the company. The employee had an option to exchange this pension (which would be for five years certain and for so much longer as the employee lived) for a "last survivor pension" for a less annual sum calculated according to the respective ages of the employee and his named wife and payable to the employee for the remainder of his life, and, if his named wife survived him, to that wife for the rest of her life. Premiums were payable by the company to the society, being derived in part from the contributions of the employees. It was declared by the policy that the company should hold the policy and all benefits payable thereunder on trust for the persons to whom the benefits were expressed to be payable. Clause 4 provided that the society would pay to the person or persons specified in the schedule thereto, i.e., the employee or his widow, on proof of existence and identity, the appropriate benefit or benefits as and when they fell due. An employee who had exercised his option to take a last survivor pension retired on Nov. 21, 1945 (after his normal pension date), and died on Feb. 17, 1946. The Inland Revenue Commissioners claimed duty on the actuarial value of the pension as at the date of the employee's death under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1.

HELD: there had not come into existence under the policy a continuing item of property distinct from the respective beneficial interests therein of the employee and his widow, and, therefore, nothing passed on the death of the employee under s. 1, but the claim for duty arose under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act of 1894.

Semble: if the society's covenant had been with the company to pay the latter during some period—e.g., a fixed period or the life of the longest liver of a number of named persons—a certain annual sum, and if the company had then declared itself a trustee of the annual sum or of the benefit of the covenant for A and B successively, it may be that there would have been a passing under s. 1 as in Re Duke of Norfolk's Will Trusts ([1950] 1 All E.R. 664).

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Dec. 7, 1950.

The Crown claimed estate duty on two pensions payable, under certain policies of assurance effected by the deceased's employers, to the deceased for his life and after his death to his widow during her life, on the footing that the pensions were property passing on the deceased's death within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1. WYNN-PARRY, J., rejected the Crown's claim, and held that the claim arose under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act of 1894 in respect of property in which the deceased "never had an interest" within the meaning of the proviso to s. 4 of that Act.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., read the following judgment of the court. In 1933 and 1942 the Austin Motor Co., Ltd. (whom we hereafter call "the company") entered into contracts with the Legal and General Assurance Society, Ltd. (whom we hereafter call "the society") for the purpose of providing benefits for certain of their employees. These contracts (which are described as "group policies", the earlier being numbered 1157 and the later 2367) are of a somewhat elaborate character, and the benefits to be provided included pensions after retirement from service with the company, life assurance, and total and permanent disablement insurance. In the present case we are concerned only with pensions.

It will be necessary for us to refer later to the terms of certain provisions in the policies or one of them, but we first state the general character and scheme of the contracts, so far as is relevant. The class of employees entitled to the benefits was defined as "eligible employees," and of these the term "original members" was applied to those eligible employees who became entitled to the benefits of the policies on their respective dates. The phrase "normal pension date" was defined as meaning, in the case of an original member under the first policy, the anniversary of the date of commencement of membership which fell nearest to attainment of the age of sixty-five, and, in the second policy, the anniversary of the date of commencement of membership which fell nearest to attainment of the age of seventy in the case of members who were aged more than 64½ years at the date of commencement of membership. The amount of the pension payable to any member was to be ascertained in accordance with tables annexed to the policies by reference to length of service with the company prior to normal pension date, and (subject to the option presently mentioned) began in the case of a member whose service terminated on normal pension date on that date and continued by monthly instalments for a period of five years certain and for so much longer thereafter as the member lived. The option to which we have referred enabled the member to exchange his own pension for what was described in both policies as a "last survivor pension" for a less annual sum calculated according to the respective ages of the member and his named wife, and payable for the remainder of the member's life only (i.e., and not for five years certain in any event) and after his death, if his named wife survived him, to that wife during the rest of her life. For the purpose of providing these pensions, premiums were payable by the company to the society derived in part from the contributions of the members themselves and in part out of the company's own resources.

The late Mr. Ernest Leopold Payton (whom we will call "Mr. Payton") had for many years before his retirement and death been in the service of the company, and he was, before he retired, chairman and joint managing director of the company. He was an original member within the meaning of both the policies. His normal pension date within the meaning of the first policy was Apr. 10, 1942, and his normal pension date within the meaning of the second policy was Apr. 13, 1947. Mr. Payton's service with the company was, with the consent of the company, prolonged until Nov. 21, 1945. He died on Feb. 17, 1946. It will be observed from the dates we have mentioned that Mr. Payton did not retire on his normal pension date under the first policy and did not survive to his normal pension date under the second policy, and, as a consequence, the terms of neither policy strictly applied so as to enable Mr. Payton to take advantage of the respective options under the policies for last survivor pensions. Special agreements were, however, made between the company, the society, and Mr. Payton (or on his behalf) so that (as has been conceded throughout these proceedings) Mr. Payton and the plaintiff (who is his widow) may be treated in all respects as enjoying respectively the benefits provided by the policies as though Mr. Payton had within the terms of the policies exercised his option in both cases for last survivor pensions in favour of himself and the plaintiff. Under the first policy the weekly contributions made by Mr. Payton amounted to fifteen shillings a week and the last survivor pension which he enjoyed from his retirement to his death and which Mrs. Payton now enjoys, amounts to £178 15s. per annum payable monthly. Under the second policy the weekly contributions made by Mr. Payton amounted to eighteen shillings, and the last survivor pension enjoyed by him and now enjoyed by Mrs. Payton is at the annual rate of £1,805 13s., also payable monthly.

In these circumstances the question has arisen of the amount of estate duty payable in respect of the two last survivor pensions as a consequence of Mr. Payton's death. The contention of the Inland Revenue Commissioners is that duty is payable under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, on "the principal value" of each pension, treating it as a single and continuing pension and as "property passing" within the meaning of the section on the death of Mr. Payton. For Mrs. Payton, on the other hand, it is contended that the case falls within s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act on the footing that the subject-matter to be taxed is Mrs. Payton's pension benefit as an "interest purchased or provided by the deceased . . . by arrangement with" the company "to the extent of the beneficial interest . . . arising by" virtue of her survivorship. Since the contest is between s. 1 and s. 2 of the Act, we may be forgiven for quoting once again the expression given by LORD MACNAGHTEN for his classic dichotomy in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) ([1899] A.C. 212):

" . . . if the case falls within s. 1 it cannot also come within s. 2. The two sections are mutually exclusive. Section 1 might properly, I think, be headed: 'With regard to property passing on death, be it enacted as follows.' Section 2 might with equal propriety be headed: 'And with regard to property not passing on death, be it enacted as follows'."

And LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON observed in A.-G. v. Milne (2) ([1914] A.C. 779):

"The expression 'passing on the death' is . . . evidently used to denote some actual change in the title or possession of the property as a whole which takes place at the death."

It is, then, established that if s. 1 is to be applicable there must, in truth, be property passing. By the definition s. 22 (1) (f) of the Act of 1894, the expression "property" includes real property and personal property, and it is, indeed, to be given the widest signification. Still, there must be some property identifiable and persisting independently of the beneficial interests therein. If that test is satisfied, then it is that property which is taxed, and the duty is chargeable on its principal value and not on the value of the benefit enjoyed by the deceased nor on the value of the benefit taken by, or arising in favour of, his successor. Further, by s. 4 of the Act, it is provided that all property passing on the death of the deceased is, for the purpose of the rate of duty, to be aggregated so as to form one estate. In the present case the actuarial value of the two "last survivor pensions" at the death of Mr. Payton was together, we were told, £17,500. The estate of Mr. Payton (apart from the pensions) amounted to over £1,000,000. The result, therefore, of the application of s. 1 would be a charge at the rate of fifty-two per cent. on the actuarial value of £17,500. If, on the other hand, there is, in truth, no such item of property which passes—if on a just analysis there was at Mr. Payton's death a cesser of his own pension and an arising of a pension of the same amount and equivalent characteristics in favour of the plaintiff, then the case falls within s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act and is excluded from aggregation under s. 4 by virtue of its proviso.

As we have already stated, the Crown contended before the learned judge and contended before this court that the conditions requisite for the application of s. 1 were satisfied because there came into existence under each of the two group policies "property", namely (putting it broadly for the moment), the single and continuing "last survivor pension," an entity distinct from the respective interests therein of Mr. Payton and the plaintiff. WYNN-PARRY, J., decided against this contention, and, in our opinion, decided rightly.

The contest being such as we have stated, it becomes necessary to examine more closely what precisely were the rights and obligations which emerged from the two policies. Counsel for the Crown reminded us that in a matter of this kind the answer depends on the result in law achieved by the particular transactions which are before the court. If the result in this case is that there has been created in each case a continuing item of property distinct from the particular interests of the two pensioners, it is no answer to the claim of the Crown that such result is for practical purposes the same as the creation, simply, of two separate, though in all material characteristics identical, pensions, the one payable to Mr. Payton and wholly ceasing on his death and the other arising for the first time on his death and payable to the plaintiff for the remainder of her life.

The question, then, turns on the legal result which flows from the language used in the policies properly construed according to the ordinary canons of construction. There is some divergence in the wording of the two policies, but it was not suggested before WYNN-PARRY, J., nor before us that for present purposes the divergence was material. It is, therefore, sufficient to refer only to the first policy, numbered 1157. After an immaterial recital, the contract (to which, as we have stated, the parties are the company and the society only) is expressed in five clauses to which are appended eleven general conditions and a schedule divided into five parts, part I relating to the pensions and parts IV and V consisting of various tables. Clause 1 of the contract contains the definitions to which we have already sufficiently alluded. Clause 2 so far as relevant provides:

"It is hereby agreed and declared that the grantees [the company] shall hold this policy and all benefits payable hereunder upon trust for the respective persons to whom the said benefits are expressed to be payable under and in accordance with the schedule hereto . . ."

Thus, quoad the pensions payable to Mr. Payton and the plaintiff, the company has declared itself a trustee for them respectively of the benefit of its contract with the society and of the benefits payable to Mr. Payton and the plaintiff pursuant thereto. But, so far, no contractual or proprietary rights have been created. These, whatever be their nature, arise under cl. 4—for we may pass over cl. 3. Clause 4 and those parts of the schedule material to the case which are incorporated by reference therein, is, therefore, the vital provision. Its terms are these:

"The society will pay . . . to the person or persons specified in the schedule hereto on proof of existence and identity the appropriate benefit or benefits as and when the same shall fall due in accordance with the terms and provisions of the schedule . . ."

Clause 5 provides that the receipt of any person or persons to whom any benefit is expressed to be payable should be a good and sufficient discharge to the society.

A Mr. Payton being treated as having validly exercised the option for a last survivor pension in favour of himself and the plaintiff, it is necessary to refer, in order to discover the incidents of last survivor pensions, to part I of the schedule where against the marginal note "last survivor pensions" it is stated:

B "At any time prior to normal pension date a male member may give written notice to the society requiring that any pension benefit becoming payable to such member at normal pension date shall after the member's death be paid to a (named) surviving wife . . .", and there follow provisions which we need not recite as regards the amount of the pensions and other matters. The amount of the pensions is calculable by reference to table VII in part IV of the schedule which bears the heading:

C "Table showing reduced amount of pension payable from normal pension date until death of survivor of male member and his wife if the member elects to take a last survivor pension."

The passages in the schedule which we have quoted are, undoubtedly, so expressed that the "last survivor pension" is treated as one pension or annuity payable in the present case to Mr. Payton and the plaintiff successively and not as two pensions of the same amount, one payable to Mr. Payton for his life and one to the plaintiff (if she survives him) for her life, and counsel for the Crown has pointed out the arithmetical difference in result if the plaintiff died less than a month after her husband. For, in such event, if a monthly instalment of pension had fallen due just before Mr. Payton's death, nothing further would be payable in respect of the period of three weeks or so for which the plaintiff survived, whereas, if there were two separate pensions, the society would be liable for the plaintiff's pension benefit in respect of that period even though the plaintiff did not live to survive the first monthly pay day after her husband's death.

What is the legal effect of these provisions? They are clearly framed so as to get over the difficulties that arise under English law in enforcing a covenant with A by B to pay a sum of money to C on the ground that such a covenant gives, if unperformed, no right to A to recover other than purely nominal damages (since he suffers none) and no right of enforcement to C (as being res inter alios). By the joint effect of cl. 2 and cl. 4 in the event of default by the society in paying, say to Mr. Payton an instalment of his pension on its due date, Mr. Payton could sue the society joining the company as co-plaintiff with him or as co-defendant with the society. So much these clauses are plainly contrived to achieve. But in this respect their effect would be the same whether there were one pension or two. Counsel for the Crown, therefore, goes further and says that under this contract there has been created a single and identifiable (and intelligible) item of property, viz., the benefit of the society's covenant with the company to pay what we may call the Payton last survivor pension throughout its term, which piece of property is enjoyed successively and is enforceable successively by Mr. Payton and Mrs. Payton. On this basis he contends that the case is in pari materia with Re Duke of Norfolk's Will Trusts (3).

We have been unable to accept the argument. If the society's covenant had been with the company to pay the latter during some period—e.g., a fixed period or the life of the longest liver of a number of named persons—a certain annual sum, and if the company had then declared itself a trustee of the annual sum or of the benefit of the covenant for A and B successively, it may well be (though we do not so decide) that the case would have been covered by the Duke of Norfolk's case (3). But the effect of his contract seems to us to be otherwise. Adhering (as enjoined by counsel for the Crown to do) to the actual terms of the bargain, there is here no covenant with the company to pay the company anything. There is a covenant with the company to pay "the pension," i.e., the annual sum of £x by monthly instalments, to Mr. Payton during the period from his retirement to his death and then to pay the same pension, i.e., the same annual sum by like instalments, to the plaintiff (if she survives Mr. Payton) during the rest of her life. Though the distinction be a fine one there does not seem to us to be in the latter case, in any real sense of the term, any single and continuing proprietary interest distinct from the beneficial interests, under the contract, of Mr. Payton and the plaintiff respectively, which proprietary interest can be said to "pass" on Mr. Payton's death. We think that some assistance may be derived from considering the effect of a release of the society by Mr. Payton during the latter's life. Such a release would appear wholly to discharge the society so that during the rest of Mr. Payton's life (or during any less period for which the release operated) there would be nothing left at all—no discernible proprietary right in the company or anyone else and certainly no acceleration of the "pension" rights of the plaintiff. A

In Re Duke of Norfolk's Will Trusts (3) the problem had arisen out of the will and codicils of a testator whereby he had (a) devised and appointed his freehold hereditaments to his trustees for a term of one thousand years and declared trusts of such term including a trust to pay out of the rents and profits any annuity bequeathed by him, and (b) given to his trustees an annuity of £2,000 to commence from the day of his death and to continue payable during the lives of his brother, the late Viscount Fitzalan, and his nephew, the then present viscount, and the life of the survivor of them and to be paid to the late viscount during his life and after his death to the then present viscount. The late viscount having died, the Crown claimed estate duty under either s. 1 or s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act in respect of the "slice" of the capital of the testator's estate which bore the same relation to the whole as did, at the date of the late viscount's death, the annual sum of £2,000 to the whole income of the estate. It was conceded throughout the case that on the true construction of the relevant provisions of the will and codicils, the interest in question was one continuing annuity (charged on the estates comprised in the one thousand years' term) for the longer of the lives of the two annuitants and could not be regarded as comprising two successive annuities, the first ceasing, and the second commencing, on the death of the late viscount: see per JENKINS, L.J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 672). The Crown, nevertheless, contended that (contrary to the existing office practice) duty was exigible on the "slice" theory and that there was no logical or sensible distinction between such a case as that before the court and the case of two separate and successive annuities—in which case duty was admittedly charged on the "slice" theory on the death of the first annuitant. They further contended that the case was distinguishable from that of Re Cassel (4) decided by RUSSELL, J., in 1927, and, alternatively, that the decision in Re Cassel (4) should be overruled. D E F G

The subject-matter in Re Cassel (4) which gave rise to the claim for duty was a direction in the testator's will that, during a period of years ending in 1995, the testator's trustees should provide out of the rents and profits of the trust estate the annual sums required for payment of rent, rates, and certain other outgoings in respect of premises known as "Brook House" which was itself bequeathed in trust for the benefit of several persons in succession. RUSSELL, J. (contrary to his own inclination) held himself bound since Cowley's case (1) to hold that there passed on the death of the first person beneficially entitled to Brook House a specific item of property, viz., the variable annuity already described, that is, the benefit of the variable annual sums to be raised and provided by the trustees. In the Duke of Norfolk's case (3) this court held that the case before them was H covered by Re Cassel (4), which it thought (having regard to later affirmation and notwithstanding certain criticisms made of the judgment of RUSSELL, J.) binding at least on the Court of Appeal: see the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 669); but it held also that the annuity bequeathed by the first and second codicil, being an item of property separate and distinct from the beneficial interests therein, "passed" on the death of the first annuitant within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act of 1894.

In our judgment, the present case is essentially different from the Duke of Norfolk's case (3) and also from Re Cassel (4). In each of those cases, the annuity arose out of specified trust property—the provisions of the will directed the trustees to raise the amount of the annuity yearly out of the income of the trust funds, for securing which in the Duke of Norfolk's case (3) a term of years was also created. The annuity so raised was given to the trustees to hold (in the Duke of Norfolk's case (3)), or was to be applied by the trustees (Re Cassel (4)) on trust for certain persons successively. In the present case the only rights and interests subsisting or capable of subsisting arise exclusively out of the terms of the contract of insurance. The only right of property which, according to the suggestion of the Crown, emerges from the respective policies is a chose in action. But a mere chose in action cannot, in our judgment, be considered or comprehended apart and separately from the right to enjoy, by the terms of the contract, the benefit contracted to be given. If there be any rights or interests of the company as distinct from the separate and individual rights of the pensioners they seem, accordingly, to us altogether too spectral to be fairly analogous to the interests of the trustees in the Duke of Norfolk's case (3) or the Cassel case (4), or to be fairly regarded as "passing" on the death of Mr. Payton within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1. For these reasons we think that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Order accordingly.

BOARD v. THOMAS HEDLEY & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 26, 27, 1951.]

Discovery—Production of documents—Action for negligence against manufacturers—Dermatitis alleged to be due to product—Application for production of complaints after date of purchase of product—Form of order.

The plaintiff claimed damages for negligence from the defendants, alleging that they had manufactured and sold a dangerous cleaning product which she had used and in consequence had contracted dermatitis on both hands. On discovery the defendants disclosed all complaints and congratulatory letters received by them up to May 18, 1950, the date when the plaintiff bought the product. On an application by the plaintiff for a further and better affidavit disclosing "all complaints and other documents relating thereto" received by the defendants since May 18, 1950,

HELD: an important issue was whether the product was dangerous, and on that issue evidence that subsequent users had suffered from dermatitis would be admissible, and, therefore, documents relating to such later complaints might lead to a train of inquiry enabling the plaintiff to advance her case, and so were relevant and ought to be disclosed, but the order must be confined to "all complaints of personal injuries and other documents relating thereto."

AS TO WHEN FURTHER AFFIDAVIT FOR DISCOVERY OF DOCUMENTS MAY BE OBTAINED, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 369, 370, paras. 446-448; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 18, pp. 88-92, Nos. 400-433.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by defendants against an order of DEVLIN, J., dated May 31, 1951, allowing an appeal of the plaintiff from Master BAKER.

Beyfus, K.C., and Ormrod for the defendants.

M. Waters for the plaintiff.

DENNING, L.J.: This case raises a question as to discovery. On the pleadings the plaintiff, Mrs. Board, alleges that she has suffered from dermatitis of both hands as a result of using the defendants' product, "Tide," for the purpose of washing clothes, and she claims damages from the defendants because, as she alleges, they were guilty of negligence in the manufacture and distribution of it. To make out her case she says that this preparation was dangerous and that the defendants ought to have known it. The defendants deny her allegations and say their product is safe for all normal users. They admit that the plaintiff suffered dermatitis as a result of using their product, but they say that it was due to her being unusually susceptible to that disease. Discovery has been ordered and the defendants have disclosed all complaints and congratulatory letters which were received by them up to May 18, 1950, when the plaintiff purchased the carton of "Tide" of which she complains, but they have not disclosed the complaints or congratulatory letters received by them after that date. The plaintiff thereupon applied for a further and better affidavit asking that the defendants should disclose "all complaints and other documents relating thereto" since May 18, 1950. The master refused the application, but on appeal DEVLIN, J., granted it. The defendants now appeal to this court.

If the sole issue had been the state of mind of the defendants when they issued the carton, that is, whether they knew or ought to have known at that time that their product was dangerous, it would be quite immaterial to inquire what complaints they received after May 18, 1950. But that is not the sole issue. Another, and a most important, issue, is whether the product was dangerous at all. The product would, I think, be dangerous if it might affect normal users adversely, or even if it might adversely affect other users who had a higher degree of sensitivity than the normal, so long as they were not altogether exceptional. On that issue it would be admissible for the defendants to call evidence that they had sold large quantities of the product without receiving any complaint, or, if they had received a few complaints, to explain those by saying that they were cases where the product had not been used properly or where the person concerned was unusually susceptible. It is common practice to call such evidence in cases like the present. Conversely, it must be admissible for the plaintiff to call witnesses at the trial, if she can find them, who are able to show that they were normal in their sensitivity, or, at any rate, not altogether exceptional, and yet they suffered from dermatitis through using the product, and those witnesses would not be confined to users before May 18, 1950, but would extend also to users at a subsequent time. The plaintiff would, if asked, have to give particulars of any person she relied on in this respect so that the defendants would be able to investigate the complaint, but the evidence would certainly be relevant and admissible.

Once it is held that evidence of dermatitis suffered by subsequent users would be admissible because it is relevant to the issue whether the product was dangerous, it follows that the documents relating to complaints of subsequent users ought to be disclosed, because they may fairly lead to a train of inquiry enabling the plaintiff to advance her case. Counsel for the defendants contended that discovery should not be allowed so as to enable the other party to "fish" for witnesses. I agree that is so in ordinary cases, but I regard this as an exceptional case which raises the issue whether or not the product is dangerous. The complaints are very relevant on that issue. The relevant information with regard to them is all in the hands of the defendants, and justice requires that the plaintiff should be put in possession of it also so that she can present her case on equal terms. If she is thereby enabled to find witnesses to support her case, all well and good, for it is very right and proper that the important issue whether the product was dangerous should be fully investigated. Counsel for the defendants said it might lead to other complainants bringing legal proceedings which they might not otherwise have done. That may be so, but I do not think that that is a sufficient reason for refusing the discovery. The order at the moment is too widely expressed. It ought to be confined to "all complaints of personal injuries and other documents relating thereto." In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

TEALE v. BURT (otherwise TEALE) AND BURT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), June 25, 26, 1951.]

Divorce—Collusion—Agreement for disposal of matrimonial property—Receipt by wife of reduced share in consideration of husband's foregoing right to claim damages—Claim for damages subsequently included in petition—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 4 (2).

By their answers to a husband's petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent the wife and the co-respondent alleged that the petition was presented in collusion with the wife and the co-respondent. It was pleaded in support of that allegation that, on becoming aware of the wife's adultery, the husband began negotiations with her for the disposal of the matrimonial property, and, that, in consideration of the husband's foregoing any right to claim damages against the co-respondent, the wife consented to accept a sum which was less than her agreed share of the matrimonial property. It was further pleaded that that agreement was carried into effect and that a sum representing the wife's share, less the amount deducted in respect of the husband's foregoing his claim for damages, was paid by the husband to the wife before the institution of the proceedings, but when the petition was filed it contained a claim for damages against the co-respondent. On an application by the husband to strike out the averment of collusion and the facts supporting it,

HELD: it was possible that collusion might be inferred from the facts alleged, and, therefore, those facts and the averment of collusion must be put before the court which tried the petition to enable it to decide whether or not there was collusion, and so they could not be struck out.

Decision of WILLMER, J., reported sub nom. T. v. B. (formerly T.) and B. (ante p. 183), affirmed.

AS TO COLLUSION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 677, 678, paras. 1000-1003; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 332-336, Nos. 3123-3160.

APPEAL by the husband from a decision of WILLMER, J., dated May 28, 1951, and reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 183, dismissing the husband's appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar COMPTON-MILLER, made on April 27, 1951, whereby he refused to strike out paragraphs, together with the particulars thereunder, contained in the answers of the wife and the co-respondent to the husband's petition for divorce on the ground of adultery. The answers contained an introductory averment that the petition was presented in collusion with the wife and the co-respondent.

Merrylees for the husband.

Harvey, K.C., Friend and Andrew Edwards for the wife and the co-respondent.

DENNING, L.J.: This case raises a short pleading point. The parties were married in September, 1931. In November, 1949, the wife left her husband and went to live in adultery with the co-respondent, a fact which is admitted on the pleadings. On June 9, 1950, the wife, in return for the sum of £1,181 15s. 3d., assigned to her husband all her interest in the boarding-house which they had carried on, and on Sept. 14, 1950, the husband brought these proceedings for a divorce in which he claims against the co-respondent £2,000 damages. A

The question arises on the answers to his petition. Both the wife and the co-respondent have put in answers in identical terms in which they allege that the husband was "guilty of collusion". In support of this allegation, they set out certain alleged facts, namely, that the wife's interest in the boarding-house was worth £1,500, and that she accepted the lesser sum of £1,181 15s. 3d. in return for the husband's promise not to claim damages from the co-respondent. The introductory averment that the petitioner "was guilty of collusion" was an inartistic label, and WILMER, J., gave leave to amend it so as to read that "the petition was presented in collusion with the respondent and the co-respondent in that the parties by agreement have provided for the conduct of the suit." The answers must be read as if that was the introductory averment. B C

There is, I think, a distinction to be drawn between the facts which are alleged and the averment of collusion with which they are introduced. So far as the facts are concerned, it is clear (and counsel for the husband so admits) that it will be the duty of the parties and of their professional advisers to bring those facts to the notice of the judge who tries the case so that he can determine whether there was collusion or not. That is always the duty in the case of arrangements made in contemplation of divorce proceedings. The parties, often quite reasonably, in anticipation of a divorce make arrangements in respect of such matters as the future of the house and furniture, the maintenance of the wife, the custody of the children, or even sometimes as to costs. Those arrangements are not collusive so long as they do not tend to pervert the course of justice. They often have to be made as a matter of necessity. They only amount to collusion if one party or the other uses them as a bribe—for instance, if a husband promises excessive maintenance as a bribe to persuade his wife to bring divorce proceedings, or if he promises to let the wife have the custody of the children as a bribe to induce her to abstain from defending herself. Parties can compromise a claim for damages in an enticement case, just as in the old days they could compromise an action for criminal conversation. So, also, they can compromise a claim for damages in divorce proceedings so long as the agreement does not tend to pervert the course of justice and it is brought to the notice of the court and sanctioned by the court. The reason why these matters have to be brought before the court is so that the judge can inquire whether there is collusion or not. Unless sanctioned by the court, they are invalid. I am, therefore, clear that the facts alleged in the answers of the wife and co-respondent are matters which must be put before the court to enable the court to reach a conclusion whether or not there was collusion. These alleged facts, therefore, cannot be struck out. D E F G

I turn now to the introductory averment. Counsel for the husband contends that, in any event, the averment of collusion ought to be struck out because the alleged facts do not warrant it. I do not agree. It seems to me that, if the court felt that the proper implication from the facts was that there was an agreement, express or implied, that the wife and the co-respondent would not set up a defence which was available to them, or would not make a counter-charge which was open to them, there would be collusion. At this stage the court cannot say that no such implication can be made. Counsel for the husband argues H

A that such an implication would have to be pleaded expressly, and that, as it is not expressly pleaded, the averment of collusion ought to be struck out. I do not think that is the proper way in which to approach the question. If facts are present from which collusion may conceivably be inferred, we ought not to strike out the introductory averment. It is possible that at the trial collusion will be negatived on the ground that there was no such implication, but we cannot strike out this averment unless it is plainly unarguable. In the present case we cannot say that. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

B BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. I appreciate the anxiety which arises when the word "collusion" rears its head in the conduct of proceedings for divorce, but I want to emphasise that the point we are now deciding is confined solely to pleading. We express no view whether or not collusion in the true sense exists here. The question is merely whether this paragraph alleging collusion be struck out at this stage. In my view, the pleading in its amended form should stand, and the trial judge will then deal with all the matters which have been raised in this court, including the question whether any implication should be drawn from the facts of this case.

C HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

WHITE AND OTHERS v. KUZYCH.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Viscount Simon, Lord Porter, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid and Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), April 18, 24, 25, 26, 30, May 1, 2, June 20, 1951.]

E Trade Union—Domestic tribunal—Adjudication on member's conduct—Provision for appeal to executive of federation—Action begun by member without proceeding to appeal—Jurisdiction of court.

F The respondent, a member of a Canadian trade union, was charged before the domestic tribunal set up under the bye-laws of the union with conduct unbecoming a member of the union and committing acts discreditable to it by campaigning against the union's policy of a "closed shop" and other offences named as "serious offences" in the bye-laws. He was found guilty, and at a general meeting a resolution was passed expelling him from the union. Article 26 of the bye-laws provided: "If a member has been found guilty . . . and feels that the decision is unfair, or the penalty too severe, he may, within sixty days file an appeal in writing with the executive of the Shipyard General Workers' Federation . . ." Article G 22 of the bye-laws provided that every member should be deemed to have entered into a contract with the union and at all times to abide by the following oath of obligation: "I promise that I will not become a party to any suit at law or in equity against this union or the federation, until H I have exhausted all remedies allowed to me by said constitution and bye-laws." After his expulsion the respondent brought an action in the British Columbia High Court for a declaration that he had not been validly expelled from the union, that he was still a member, and for consequential relief.

HELD: the conclusion reached at the general meeting to expel the respondent was a "decision" within the meaning of art. 26, even though it was tainted by bias or prejudice or arrived at in defiance of natural justice; accordingly, the conclusion reached by the general meeting was subject to an appeal to the federation which the respondent was bound by his contract to pursue before he issued his writ; and, therefore, he was not entitled to the declaration which he sought.

APPEAL by defendants against an order of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia, dated May 3, 1950, affirming a decision of WHITTAKER, J., on Sept. 22, 1949, that the respondent (plaintiff in the action) was entitled to a declaration that he had not been validly expelled from membership of the Boilermakers' and Iron Shipbuilders' Union of Canada, Local No. 1, but was still a member of good standing, and awarding him $5,000 damages. C

J. W. de B. Farris, K.C. (with him N. T. Nenetz) (both of the Canadian Bar), of the appellants. D

A. W. Johnson (of the Canadian Bar) for the respondent.

June 20. The following judgment of the Board was delivered by VISCOUNT SIMON. This is an appeal by the defendants in the action from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for British Columbia dated May 3, 1950 (O'HALLORAN, ROBERTSON, and SIDNEY SMITH, JJ.A., SLOAN, C.J., and BIRD, J.A., dissentiente), which dismissed the appellants' appeal from a judgment of WHITTAKER, J., dated Sept. 22, 1949, in the respondent's favour. The litigation has involved the examination of a mass of evidence and the discussion of a number of difficult questions arising therefrom, but, as will appear in the sequel, the conclusion to be reached is arrived at by an overriding consideration which makes it unnecessary to pronounce on some of the other issues that have been raised. E

The respondent is a welder. He became a member of the Boilermakers' and Iron Shipbuilders' Union of Canada, Local No. 1 (hereinafter referred to as "the union"), in April, 1943. He has brought this action for a declaration that he has not been validly expelled from membership of the union, but is still a member of it in good standing, and for consequential relief. The judgment of WHITTAKER, J., which the Court of Appeal by a majority confirmed, so declared and awarded him $5,000 as damages. The union had a contract with North Vancouver Ship Repairs, Ltd., at whose shipyard the respondent worked, one of the terms of which was that only members of the union would be employed. Such a contract constituted the shipyard a "closed shop." According to the witness Stewart, who had been a member of the union since 1942 and was an ex-president, the principle of the "closed shop" was the policy of the union since its inception. One of the objects and purposes of the union, as stated in its bye-laws dated Aug. 8, 1944, was "to consummate closed shop agreements in order to establish an equitable and lasting relationship with employers." The respondent was and is opposed to the principle of the closed shop and expressed himself, both before and at the trial of this action, as regarding it as "a very great evil," which he would tolerate "as long as it is necessary but not a moment longer." His criticisms went so far as to say that there was no F trade union in Canada with whose principles he agreed, and he denounced the union, or at any rate the control over it exercised by its executive, as "spurious" and a "fake."

Such an attitude, whatever its justification, was not calculated to make him generally acceptable to the union and its officers, and in February, 1945, after much previous controversy and some abortive litigation, three charges were made against him in writing, by a member of the union, of offences committed in breach of art. 26 of the bye-laws of the union, as follows:

"(i) he assisted in holding an unauthorised public meeting to discuss internal business of the union; (ii) between October, 1942, and December, 1944, he was guilty of conduct unbecoming of a member of the union and committed acts discreditable to it in publicly opposing established policies of the union by campaigning against the closed shop principle; and (iii) he violated the oath of obligation of a member of the union in failing to repudiate certain radio broadcasts made in his behalf, which contained statements slanderous of one Stewart, a member and then president of the union."

Each of these offences was included in the list of "serious offences" under group B of the article.

Article 26 went on to provide that, on such a charge being laid and read out to a general business meeting of the union, it should be handed to the Press and Investigating Committee "to conduct the trial." The respondent was duly notified of the charges and of the date and place of hearing, as the bye-law required. He attended the proceedings, giving evidence and being cross-examined. He alleged that he wished other members, named McPheator and Mole, to attend as witnesses, but this was refused him by the committee. It turned out, however, that he wished for their presence only as observers and he did not intend to call them to testify.

The bye-law prescribes that the committee at the end of the hearing is to take a vote "to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused" and to prepare a concise report for the next regular general meeting of the union. This was done. The report was unanimous and found the respondent guilty on all three charges. Under the bye-law the steps then to be taken are as follows:

"(10) After the report is read out at a general membership meeting, the motion shall be put to accept or reject the committee's report and there shall be no debate or review of the case by the meeting; but the meeting shall first hear the views of the minority of the trial committee, if any, and shall permit one each, of the complainant's and accused's witnesses to plead for, or state their side, and shall permit statements to be made by the complainant and the defendant, or by their counsels, and by the union's counsel if one has been appointed; and all the said persons shall be given the right of the floor for an equal and predetermined period. (11) The meeting shall then vote on the motion by show-of-hands, standing or secret ballot, and if the charges are sustained by a majority of the members voting, the accused stands convicted and the meeting shall fix the penalty, also by majority vote; but concurrence of a two-thirds majority present and voting shall be required to expel a member. If the charges are not sustained, the defendant shall automatically be declared exonerated of the alleged offence."

Then follows a provision headed "Appeals":

"If a member has been found guilty by a general business meeting of any offence under group B of this article and feels that the decision is unfair, or the penalty too severe, he may, within sixty days file, an appeal in writing with the executive of the Shipyard General Workers' Federation; but no appeal shall be permitted from the imposition of a fine, or in cases where a fine was part of some other penalty, unless such fine is first paid. If expulsion has been the penalty, an appeal shall stay the order, until decision by the appellate tribunal, but shall not restore the accused to regular membership and his status shall be that of a charged member, as specified in group B, s. (5) of this article."

Article 22 of the bye-laws provided in paras. (5) and (6) that a person who remained a member of the union after the bye-laws came into force (as was the case with the respondent) should be deemed to have entered into a contract with the union and with every other member therein whereby, in consideration of the benefits bestowed by such membership, such person undertook to accept, endorse, and at all times abide by the terms of the oath of obligation set forth in para. (7). The part of the oath of obligation which is immediately relevant in the present case runs as follows:

"I promise that I will not become a party to any suit at law or in equity against this union or the federation, until I have exhausted all remedies allowed to me by said constitution and bye-laws."

It is a crucial circumstance in the present litigation that it was instituted by the respondent without first appealing to the federation from the findings against him in the report and the resolution of expulsion subsequently adopted at the general business meeting.

The general business meeting (called in para. (10) of the bye-law the general membership meeting) before which the report came was held on Mar. 19, 1945, the chair being taken by the appellant Nuttall. Stewart put the case for the report, and the respondent, not without considerable interruption, opposed. Then, before the vote was taken, Nuttall spoke for a few minutes, strongly denouncing the respondent as a friend of the capitalist class—an intervention not in any way justified by the bye-law. On a show of hands a resolution expelling the respondent from the union was passed by 454 to twelve. A member named Jenkins was observed to be taking down the names of those who voted in the minority, and this is relied on by the respondent as confirming his allegation that the vote was influenced by intimidation. Moreover, the trial judge accepted the evidence of McPheator (i) that the appellant Clark, who afterwards acted on the committee which tried the respondent, told him that the respondent would be "crucified" by the committee—this, however, as the respondent's counsel admitted, was before Clark was elected to the committee—and (ii) that the appellant White warned McPheator to "lay off" talking to the respondent "or what they contemplated doing to him would also happen to me." WHITTAKER, J., also accepted the evidence of Mole that Clark had used threatening language to him if he continued to follow and back up the respondent. The evidence as to these threats seems to indicate that White and Clark were speaking in reference to an impending election of union officers (when the respondent stood unsuccessfully for the presidency) which took place in December, 1944.

Whatever the correct details may be, their Lordships are bound to conclude that there was, before and after the trial, strong and widespread resentment felt against the respondent by many in the union and that Clark, among others, formed and expressed adverse views about him. If the so-called "trial" and the general meeting which followed had to be conducted by persons previously free from all bias and prejudice, this condition was certainly not fulfilled. It would, indeed, be an error to demand from those who took part the strict impartiality of mind with which a judge should approach and decide an issue between two litigants—that "icy impartiality of a Rhadamanthus" which BOWEN, L.J., in Jackson v. Barry Ry. Co. (1) ([1893] 1 Ch. 248) thought could not be expected of the engineer-arbitrator—or to regard as disqualified from acting any member who had held and expressed the view that the "closed shop" principle was essential to the policy and purpose of the union. What those who considered the charges against the respondent and decided whether he was guilty ought to bring to their task was a will to reach an honest conclusion after hearing what was urged on either side and a resolve not to make up their minds beforehand on his personal guilt, however firmly they held their conviction as to union policy and however strongly they had shared in previous adverse criticism of the respondent's conduct.

A The question of the extent to which those who took part in the so-called trial, and in the general meeting which considered the report, were actuated or influenced, not only by pre-conceived views, but by a resolve to condemn the respondent, is a question of fact to be deduced or inferred from the evidence. WHITTAKER, J., concluded that

“it cannot by any stretch of the imagination be said that the trial within the union was one that was free from prejudice and bias.”

B And after referring to the evidence of McPheator and Mole and to an article written by the secretary of the union in its official organ on Feb. 2, 1945, which strongly denounced the respondent's previous conduct and said that if he “intends to take us to court again, he will be placing the entire trade union movement on trial as to whether a trade union has the right to discipline its members for violation of union policies and individual member's obligations,”

C the learned judge added:

“It is almost inconceivable that so determined an effort should have been made to influence the members against the plaintiff while the charges were pending and before the plaintiff had been tried . . . In the light of the facts detailed above, I am of the opinion that the purported expulsion of the plaintiff was contrary to natural justice.”

D In the Court of Appeal, O'HALLORAN, J.A., went even further, holding that the leaders of the union had no justification for the conclusion that the respondent was an enemy of organised labour and that the trial committee “was inexorably biased against the respondent.” He went on:

E “In such circumstances it was obviously impossible for the respondent to receive a fair trial on the merits. Once it was proven he was against the closed shop policy and in favour of the open shop policy (as he readily conceded he was), it was obvious the verdict would be for his expulsion from the union. There could be in that trial committee as constituted no opportunity for judicial consideration of the question on its merits. The verdict for expulsion was inevitably prejudiced and virtually decided before the trial was held. In essence, there was no trial at all. The trial committee was simply carrying out the declared policy of the union as announced by its leaders at the time.”

F O'HALLORAN, J.A., after dwelling on the gravity of a sentence of expulsion, in view of its effect in limiting or destroying the respondent's prospects of obtaining work elsewhere, went on to lay it down:

G “A man has a right to work at his trade. If membership in a union is a condition attached to working at his trade, then he has an indefeasible right to belong to that union. It must be so, or else the union can have no right to agitate for a closed shop . . . Moreover, the civil liberties of the subject cannot be decided by a trial committee set up by a labour union. That is the prerogative of the constituted courts of the country. In my judgment, the question the union trial committee sought to deal with in the circumstances here was beyond the competence of any union to decide.”

H Their Lordships, while fully alive to the considerations which weighed with this learned judge, must not be understood to agree with these last observations, which form no part of the argument used by the other judges who considered the case, and which are not necessary to support the view which has hitherto prevailed in this litigation. Moreover, it is right to observe that the defence that the union was an illegal association, having objects which are in restraint of trade, was pleaded in the amended statement of defence, but at the trial WHITTAKER, J., held that the defence of illegality was not sufficiently raised and, in any case, was not established. This finding was not challenged on appeal and is not really in issue before their Lordships.

ROBERTSON, J.A., agreed with the trial judge that the purported expulsion was contrary to natural justice and further held that the committee was not competent to hear the charges and that Clark, a member of the committee, was so biased against the respondent as to render him unfit to act. SIDNEY SMITH, J.A., thought that the phrase "natural justice" had little meaning and that it might be misleading. He quoted the words of HAMILTON, L.J., in the Court of Appeal in R. v. Local Government Board. Ex p. Arlidge (2) ([1914] 1 K.B. 199), that the phrase was an "expression . . . sadly lacking in precision." While accepting and applying the view of MAUGHAM, J., in Maclean v. Workers' Union (3), that the conduct of a person charged might well be such that every other member of the union might have a strong animus against him, and agreeing that the court should not interfere merely because the committee and the general executive detested him, the learned judge went on to say:

"But the plaintiff's actions by no means justified the conduct that some of the committee and some of the main executive had been guilty of. No resentment, however just, can excuse it."

And, after reviewing the evidence, he concluded that the expulsion was invalid and bad in law. The two judges who were in the minority in the Court of Appeal, SLOAN, C.J., and BIRD, J.A., do not express any dissent from the adverse view on the merits taken by their colleagues, and their Lordships will deal with the matter on the basis that severe condemnation of the methods followed in the proceedings under review is fully justified. If these were the only relevant considerations, some difficult questions would arise. For example: Is the conclusion of a judicial tribunal acting within its jurisdiction, which is arrived at in a way which amounts to a denial of natural justice, appealable, or, on the contrary, is it simply void and thus not subject to appeal at all? And the further question would then have to be considered, viz., how far the law on the subject of bias or prejudice or failure to apply natural justice extends to such a tribunal as the trial committee and the general meeting which is considering the committee's report.

The answers to these questions would not, however, be decisive of the present case, if the view taken by the two judges who were in the minority of the Court of Appeal prevails. The respondent, after his condemnation by the general meeting, did not appeal to the Shipyard General Workers' Federation before invoking the court's jurisdiction, although he was contractually bound not to institute any action against the union until he had exhausted all the remedies allowed by the union's constitution and bye-laws. The Chief Justice and BIRD, J.A., took the view that on this ground the respondent's claim must fail. This issue has been elaborately and excellently argued before their Lordships by counsel on either side and it remains to examine the contention. The respondent sets up two answers to it. (i) He contends that the trial committee was not properly constituted. If this is proved to be so, any proceedings for hearing and deciding on the charges were a nullity; the general meeting had no valid report before them; the sentence of expulsion would be without authority under the bye-laws; and there would be no basis for an appeal to the federation. (ii) Even if the committee was properly constituted, he contends that the conclusion reached at the general meeting should not be regarded as a "decision" on the ground that it was arrived at by methods which make it contrary to natural justice and that it is the result of bias and even intimidation.

The respondent relied on expressions in some English cases which would suggest that a conclusion reached by certain tribunals in such circumstances may depart so far from a judicial pronouncement as not to amount to a "decision" at all. However this may be, a crucial question under this second head is whether the conclusion reached by the general committee was a "decision" within the meaning of that word in the provision headed "Appeals" above quoted.

- A On both of these points there is a difference of opinion among the British Columbian judges. As to (i) WHITTAKER, J., held that the committee was not properly constituted, inasmuch as when one of the six declared to have been elected to it was found not to be qualified, the vacancy was not filled by the election of one new member, but the five who had been duly elected resigned and were re-nominated together with a substituted candidate, while the rest of the candidates originally nominated but not elected were treated as no longer standing. Thus, the six who acted as the committee had an unopposed return. In the Court of Appeal, O'HALLORAN, J.A., did not pronounce on the point, ROBERTSON, J.A., assumed that the second election produced a validly constituted committee, SIDNEY SMITH, J.A., was by no means satisfied that there was anything irregular in the method chosen for filling the vacancy, while BIRD, J.A., with whom SLOAN, C.J., agreed, considered that the method adopted was "... a bona fide attempt to resolve the difficulty consequent upon the discovery of the disqualification of one member"

- D and that the solution as a whole "constituted a reasonable and practical compliance with the spirit of the bye-laws." The secretary to the committee was chosen by its members out of their own body, whereas bye-law 18 directed that he should be "the most successful candidate," but this adaptation was necessitated by the fact that all the members were elected without a ballot. Their Lordships, after receiving argument on issue (i) from both sides, intimated at the hearing that in their view the trial committee must be regarded as validly constituted.

- E As to (ii) the whole difficulty is to put the proper construction on the word "decision" when the bye-law gives a right of appeal from the general meeting to the federation if a member found guilty or penalised by the former "feels that the decision is unfair or the penalty too severe." The view of SLOAN, C.J., and BIRD, J.A., is that the conclusion reached by the general meeting was a
- F "decision" within the meaning of that expression in the bye-laws even though it was tainted by bias or prejudice or arrived at in defiance of natural justice, and even though the voting of some members may have been affected by intimidation. According to this view, these circumstances, or the allegation of them, would be matter for the consideration of the appellate tribunal, and would not justify the contention that no appeal was possible because there was
- G no "decision" to appeal against. After anxious reflection, their Lordships have reached the conclusion that this is the correct view. The meaning of "decision" in bye-law 26 must be arrived at by examining the bye-laws as a whole. The scheme of them manifestly is that members of the union design to settle disputes between a member and the union in the domestic forum to the exclusion of the law courts, at any rate until the remedies provided
- H by the constitution and bye-laws, including the opportunity for appeal to the federation, are fully exhausted. If the question had been asked of the respondent or of any of his fellow-members: "What was the decision of the general committee?" it cannot be doubted that the answer would have been, not that no decision had been given, but that the decision was to condemn and expel the respondent. And this would be so, not only because it is the natural reply for members of the union to give in the circumstances, but because it would be the right answer. "Decision" in the bye-law means "conclusion." The refinement which lawyers may appreciate between a tribunal's "decision" and a conclusion pronounced by a tribunal which, though within the tribunal's jurisdiction, may be treated, because of the improper way in which it was reached, as no decision at all, and, therefore, incapable of being subject to appeal, cannot be attributed to the draftsman of these bye-laws or to the trade unionists who adopted them as their domestic code.

Their Lordships are, therefore, constrained to hold that the conclusion reached by the general committee was subject to appeal. And they must respectfully repudiate both the correctness and the relevance of the view that it would have been useless for the respondent to appeal because the federation would be sure to decide against him. They see no reason why the federation, if called on to deal with the appeal, should be assumed to be incapable of giving its honest attention to a complaint of unfairness or of undue severity and of endeavouring to arrive at the right final decision. At any rate, this is the appeal which the respondent was bound by his contract to pursue before he could issue his writ. He has not done so, and on this ground their Lordships will advise His Majesty that the appeal must be allowed. The respondent must bear the costs of the appeal to this Board and of the appeal to the Court of Appeal in British Columbia, but each party should bear its own costs of the trial where the point on which the appellants now succeed was not originally raised.

Appeal allowed.

ALEXANDER v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), May 24, 25, 28, 29, 1951.]

Bailment—Luggage—Railway cloak-room—Conditions excluding liability—Delivery to third party without production of tickets—Fundamental breach of contract—Right of Railway Executive to rely on conditions—"Misdelivery."

On Aug. 22, 1948, the plaintiff deposited a large amount of baggage at a railway station, where, with the assistance of C., he re-packed it. He was issued with tickets relating to the deposit, and he paid the due charges therefor. The deposit was made subject, inter alia, to the following conditions which were sufficiently brought to the plaintiff's notice: "2. (a) The [railway] company shall not be liable for loss, misdelivery or detention of, or damage to—Any articles or property, which separately or in aggregate exceed the value of £5, unless at the time of deposit the true value and nature thereof shall have been declared by the depositor, and 1d. per £ sterling of the declared value paid for each day, or part of a day, in addition to the ordinary cloak-room charges . . . 3. The company shall be entitled to withhold the articles or property deposited except on production of the ticket issued in respect thereof. The company may deliver such articles or property to—(a) any person producing the ticket, or (b) any person, who fails to produce the ticket, upon such evidence of the loss of the ticket, and of ownership or authority to receive the articles or property, as the company's servants may consider satisfactory, in which case the company's form of indemnity must be signed by the person to whom the articles or property are delivered. The delivery of the articles or property shall acquit the company from all further claims in respect thereof. 4. Depositors are not permitted access to any articles deposited." The plaintiff did not make the additional payment referred to in condition No. 2 (a) although the value of the baggage exceeded £5. On Sept. 2, 1948, C. was permitted by the parcels clerk in breach of regulations to remove certain articles from one of the deposited trunks. On Sept. 25, 1948, C. persuaded the parcels clerk to permit him to remove further articles on payment by him of certain accrued charges and his signing a form of indemnity. C. then re-deposited the remaining baggage and received tickets for it. On Oct. 19, 1948, C. wrote to the parcels clerk enclosing the new tickets and asking that the baggage be sent to him. The baggage was sent, and C. paid the charges. C. then disposed of the baggage, which was the property of the plaintiff, who claimed damages from the Railway Executive in respect of the loss suffered by him.

HELD: (i) the Railway Executive were guilty of a breach of an implied term fundamental to their contract of bailment with the plaintiff in permitting C. on Sept. 2, 1948, to remove articles from the plaintiff's baggage, with the result that the contract was terminated and the Executive could not thereafter rely on the terms and conditions of the contract excluding their liability in relation to the rest of the baggage.

Dictum of COHEN, L.J., in North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham ([1950] 1 All E.R. 784), applied.

(ii) apart from any question of bailment, there had been such a breach of a fundamental term of the contract as to give the plaintiff the right to rescind it, and, therefore, the Railway Executive were disentitled from relying on the special conditions of the contract.

(iii) even if the Railway Executive were not precluded from relying on the conditions, condition No. 3 was inapplicable because there was no such evidence before the parcels clerk that the tickets had been lost or that C. had authority to receive the baggage as could reasonably be regarded by him as satisfactory; and there had been no misdelivery of the baggage because the term "misdelivery" in condition No. 2 (a) meant a wrong delivery involving some form of mistake or inadvertence, and, therefore, condition No. 2 (a) would not protect the Railway Executive.

ACTION for damages for breach of a contract of bailment.

On Aug. 22, 1948, the plaintiff in company with one, Colmar, and others, took a number of trunks and other baggage belonging to the plaintiff to Launceston railway station. Having, with Colmar's help, re-packed some of the trunks, the plaintiff, who had been engaged locally in a theatrical performance with Colmar, deposited the baggage at the station, and, in return for the due payment of the booking charges, he received cloak-room tickets in respect of it. Most of the trunks and cases were locked or roped. On Sept. 2, 1948, when the parcels clerk, one Wakeford, came on duty, he found Colmar inside the parcels office with one of the trunks opened. Wakeford (who had not originally accepted the deposit) was informed by another member of the station staff that Colmar was one of those who had packed the baggage, and Colmar persuaded Wakeford to let him remove various articles on his signing a list of them. On Sept. 25, 1948, after Colmar had alleged that the plaintiff had sent the tickets to him, Colmar, or to the station, but that they must have been lost in the post, Wakefield again permitted Colmar to remove various articles. Colmar paid the excess charges in respect of the baggage, and signed a form of indemnity. He then re-deposited the baggage and received new tickets in respect of it. On Oct. 19, 1948, Colmar wrote from Liverpool enclosing the tickets and asking that the baggage be sent to Rochdale railway station where he would collect it and pay the charges. The baggage was sent as asked, and Colmar disposed of a large proportion of it. He was later prosecuted and pleaded Guilty to a charge of larceny.

Laski, K.C., and Lloyd-Davies for the plaintiff.

Berryman, K.C., and W. G. Wingate for the defendants.

DEVLIN, J., stated the facts and continued: The question which I now have to determine is whether there is any liability in the defendants. Prima facie, they are bailees of the goods, and, prima facie, the liability of a bailee is to restore the goods to the bailor in the same condition as they were deposited, and that the defendants have failed to do. They base their defence on two conditions which they said formed part of the contract of bailment and excuse them from liability. These conditions were contained in very small print on the cloak-room tickets and were also contained on a large notice which was exhibited in the waiting room and in the parcels office.

The defendants rely, first, on condition No. 2 (a), which provides:

"The company shall not be liable for loss, misdelivery or detention of, or damage to—Any articles or property, which separately or in aggregate exceed the value of £5, unless at the time of deposit the true value and nature thereof shall have been declared by the depositor, and 1d. per £ sterling of the declared value paid for each day, or part of a day, in addition to the ordinary cloak-room charges . . ."

It is not disputed that these articles exceeded the value of £5. I find that their true value was never declared and the 1d. per £ sterling was not paid. Accordingly, the defendants say that they are not liable for loss, misdelivery or detention, and claim that what happened was a loss or misdelivery. Secondly, the defendants rely on condition No. 3, which provides:

"The company shall be entitled to withhold the articles or property deposited except on production of the ticket issued in respect thereof. The company may deliver such articles or property to—(a) any person producing the ticket, or (b) any person, who fails to produce the ticket, upon such evidence of the loss of the ticket, and of ownership or authority to receive the articles or property, as the company's servants may consider satisfactory, in which case the company's form of indemnity must be signed by the person to whom the articles or property are delivered. The delivery of the articles or property shall acquit the company from all further claims in respect thereof."

Under this clause the defendants contend that they delivered the articles to Colmar, as a person who failed to produce the ticket, on evidence of the loss of the ticket and of ownership and authority which was satisfactory to Mr. Wakeford who was concerned with the matter, and, accordingly, the delivery to Colmar acquits the defendants from all further claims in respect thereof.

[His LORDSHIP rejected arguments by the plaintiff that there was a special contract made between himself and the defendants excluding the conditions on which the defendants relied, and that the conditions were not reasonably brought to his notice, and continued:] The next argument which the plaintiff puts forward is that there was a breach of the terms of the bailment on Sept. 2, 1948, which disentitled the defendants from relying thereafter on the exceptions in the contract, and, indeed, put an end to the contract of bailment. In the statement of claim it is alleged that the defendants in breach of the agreement

A "on or about Sept. 1, 1948, allowed one William George Colmar without the knowledge or authority of the plaintiff and without any possible right in the said Colmar so to do to enter the said parcels office, break open the said packages, extract articles therefrom, and finally remove from the said parcels office and take into his possession the said articles and one of the said packages."

That has been made out by the evidence in relation to five of the articles that were taken away on Sept. 2. In answer to the plea of the conditions, it is pleaded:

B "The plaintiff will contend that the defendants can rely upon the said conditions provided that and so long as the defendants themselves are not in breach of the said conditions . . . The defendants are in breach of the said conditions in that they wrongfully and in breach of condition No. 4 allowed the said Colmar to have access in the manner set forth in . . . the statement of claim and the particulars furnished thereunder

C to the said six packages."

Condition No. 4 provides: "Depositors are not permitted access to any article deposited." The breach of that condition is a breach of the contract, so the plaintiff alleges, and it is a fundamental breach which goes to the root of the matter and determines the bailment. This sort of point has been considered in a number of cases which, themselves on rather different lines, are comprehended within the same principle. The well-known case of Lilley v. Double-day (1) deals with bailments and with exceptions applying or not applying when the articles are moved to an unauthorised place. Cases such as Hain S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Tate & Lyle, Ltd. (2) deal with fundamental breaches of a contract of affreightment when there has been a deviation from the contract voyage and the effect thereof on the exceptions contained in the contract of affreightment.

E Counsel for the plaintiff relied on the recent case of North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham (3). Counsel referred to the following passage in the judgment of COHEN, L.J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 784):

"I must further point out that [the hirer], in instructing the defendant to sell, and in selling, the car, committed a breach of the contract which goes to the root of it. In those circumstances, a passage in HALSBURY, Hailsham ed., vol. 1, p. 736, para. 1211, seems in point. It says: 'The act of the bailee in doing something inconsistent with the terms of the contract terminates the bailment, causing the possessory title to revert to the bailor, and entitling him to maintain an action of trover.' That view is stated in somewhat similar language in POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION IN THE COMMON LAW, p. 132, where it is said: 'Any act or disposition which is wholly repugnant to or as it were an absolute disclaimer of the holding as bailee re-vests the bailor's right to possession, and therefore also his immediate right to maintain trover or detinue even where the bailment is for a term or is otherwise not revocable at will, and so a fortiori in a bailment determinable at will.' The authority cited for both those passages is Fenn v. Bittleston (4), the relevant passage occurring in the judgment of PARKE, B. (7 Exch. 159)."

H

The learned lord justice goes on to say that those passages are a correct statement of the law. Substantially the same thing was stated by ASQUITH, L.J., earlier where he said (ibid., 782), in effect, that as a general principle of law it was right to say that a bailee who comports himself in a manner utterly repugnant to the terms of the bailment terminates the bailment and thereupon the right to possession re-vests in the bailor.

These principles are clearly laid down. The difficulty always is to see how they apply to the facts of the case. I must first ask myself whether there was a breach of contract on Sept. 2, 1948; secondly, whether it was a breach of a fundamental term; and, thirdly, what are its consequences in law. That there has been a breach of contract is, I think, hardly denied. There is obviously a duty on a bailee to take care of the goods, and that means to keep them safe from interference by third parties. Accordingly, quite apart from the delivery of the five articles, when the defendants' servants allowed Colmar to enter the parcels room and to open at least one of the trunks and have access to the articles there, they were breaking what was an essential term of the bailment and one that was plainly implied in the contract between these parties. Whether when the five articles were taken away there was a misdelivery which could come within one of the exceptions, I do not think I need for this purpose determine because I think that before the five articles were taken away, when access was allowed, there was a breach of the contract which the defendants are unable to justify, and which they do not, I think, seek to justify, by reference to any one of the conditions and terms in the contract which protected them. A B

Was that, then, a fundamental breach of contract? I think, on consideration, that it was. There can be no doubt that the duty to take care is an essential part of the duty of a bailee, and the importance that should be attached to the exclusion of unauthorised persons from access to articles which are in a cloak-room can hardly be over-emphasised. The view that the defendants themselves take is shown by the fact that they specifically provide in their contract that not even the depositor himself is to be entitled to have access to the articles, and still more must it, therefore, be that no third person should be entitled to have access thereto. Furthermore, to permit the breaking open of locked articles appears to me to come within the character of a fundamental breach. The evidence is not entirely clear on that point, but I think, on the whole, that I ought to draw the inference that on Sept. 2 the probability is that one of the locked articles was broken into. In Bontex Knitting Works, Ltd. v. St. John's Garage (5) it was held that the leaving of a delivery van unintended by the driver was a fundamental breach of contract which disentitled the bailees of the goods in the van from relying on the exceptions in the contract. If that be so, then it is certainly a much greater breach of contract to allow access by unauthorised persons to articles which are deposited in a cloak-room. On that view, therefore, counsel for the plaintiff contends that, in accordance with the passage which I have cited from North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham (3), the bailment was brought to an end. The result of that would be, of course, that the defendants could not thereafter rely in relation to the other incidents when they parted with the main bulk of the goods, apart from the articles already removed, on the terms and conditions of the contract which were inserted for their protection. C D E F

The matter may, perhaps, be put in another way, quite apart from the law of bailment. The ordinary law of contract, as it is discussed in Hain S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Tate & Lyle, Ltd. (2) in the House of Lords, involves that where there has been a breach of a fundamental term of the contract which gives the other party the right to rescind the contract, then, unless and until with full knowledge of all the facts the other party elects to affirm and not to rescind, the special terms of the contract go and cannot be relied on by the defaulting party. There is no question that the plaintiff ever knew of the circumstances in this case which entitled him to rescind or that he ever elected to affirm the contract. G H

I think, therefore, that this point succeeds and provides a good answer to the defendants' reliance on the conditions and that this defence fails. I think, however, that I ought also to examine the conditions which have been relied on, partly because I desire to sustain the conclusion which I have already expressed by the further conclusion that, even if the conditions were applicable, they would not, in the circumstances of this case, assist the defendants, and partly because those further conditions involve findings of fact which it is necessary that I should make in case the view which I have expressed is wrong in law.

- I will take, first of all, condition No. 3, because it is the one which is obviously
A designed to deal with this sort of situation. Counsel for the defendants concedes that, although it is not expressly so stated in the condition, there must be reasonable grounds for the satisfaction of the defendants. The condition reads "such evidence . . . as the company's servants may consider satisfactory." Counsel concedes that that must mean "may reasonably consider satisfactory" and that there must be reasonable grounds for the decision of Mr. Wakeford,
B who was the official responsible in this case. It has been contended on the part of the plaintiff that there were no such reasonable grounds. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence and continued:] I have come to the conclusion that there were no reasonable grounds and no evidence which should have satisfied Mr. Wakeford, first, that the tickets had been lost, and, secondly, that Colmar had authority to receive the goods.
- C Counsel for the defendants, however, says that, apart from the question of the applicability of condition No. 3, there was a loss or misdelivery under condition No. 2. I do not think it is contended that there was any loss except in the sense that there was a misdelivery. Therefore, the question which arises is whether in the circumstances of this case a delivery to Colmar can rightly be regarded as a misdelivery within the meaning of that word as it is used in D condition No. 2. No doubt, if "misdelivery" means any delivery to the wrong person, even a deliberate delivery to the wrong person, then the case is covered, and it may well be true to say that in many cases that is the right meaning of the word "misdelivery." It appears to be the dictionary meaning. There is no authority that directly bears on the point. Counsel has cited several cases to me, but I do not think it is necessary that I should review them, because
E they do not really deal with the sort of point which I have to consider. The alternative argument is that "misdelivery" in its natural and ordinary meaning conveys to the ordinary man that there has been some mistake or inadvertence. If, for example, there are two conflicting claims between A and B and the bailee who holds the goods weighs them carefully up and decides, on the whole, that he ought to deliver to A, and decides wrongly, I doubt that in the ordinary
F sense of the word he would be said to have misdelivered to A, although he has wrongly delivered. When, for example, Mr. Wakeford in this case allowed Colmar to abstract the five articles on Sept. 2, he, Wakeford, knowing quite well that it was in breach of the regulations, but being moved to do so by the rather pitiful tale which Colmar told him, was he misdelivering them to A? If, taking a third example, he had taken all the articles out of all the trunks and distributed
G them to anybody who came to ask for them, could it be said, in the ordinary use of language, that he was misdelivering? I am disposed to think that while in certain contexts the word "misdelivery" may bear the wider meaning, in its more natural and popular meaning it is restricted to a wrong delivery involving some form of mistake or inadvertence, and that it is intended to cover the sort of situation where a package is delivered to the wrong person or address
H by error or inadvertence, or where the wrong article is handed out over a counter or in a cloak-room. No principle is more firmly settled than that when one is construing exceptions to the general liability of a carrier or a bailee, those exceptions are to be construed strictly, and, if a word is capable of bearing two meanings, it is the narrower meaning which ought to be given to it. I think that where "misdelivery" is used in an exception designed to protect a bailee, it does not cover more, and would not be regarded by the ordinary man who read such conditions as covering more, than what I might call accidental misdelivery by mistake or error; and that, if a bailee in such circumstances wants to protect himself against every sort of wrongful delivery, however deliberately made, he must use clear and express terms to that end. Accordingly, I should hold that that condition, if it applied, would not protect the defendants in this case. For these reasons, the plaintiff's claim succeeds on liability, and there must be an inquiry into the amount of the damage which he has sustained.

NANCE v. BRITISH COLUMBIA ELECTRIC RAILWAY CO., LTD. B

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Viscount Simon, Lord Porter, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid and Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), April 17-20, 23, June 20, 1951.]

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Running down action—Duty of plaintiff towards traffic.

When contributory negligence is set up as a defence, its existence does not depend on any duty owed by the injured party to the party sued and all that is necessary to establish such a defence is to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the injured party did not in his own interest take reasonable care of himself and contributed, by this want of care, to his own injury. For when contributory negligence is set up as a shield against the obligation to satisfy the whole of the plaintiff's claim, the principle involved is that, where a man is part author of his own injury, he cannot call on the other party to compensate him in full. This, however, is not to say that in all cases the plaintiff who is guilty of contributory negligence owes to the defendant no duty to act carefully. Indeed, it would appear that in cases relating to running-down accidents such a duty exists. The proposition can be put even more broadly. Generally speaking, when two parties are so moving in relation to one another as to involve risk of collision, each owes to the other a duty to move with due care, and this is true whether they are both in control of vehicles, or both proceeding on foot, or whether one is on foot and the other controlling a moving vehicle.

APPEAL by the plaintiff and CROSS-APPEAL by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia (SLOAN, C.J., O'HALLORAN and SIDNEY SMITH, JJ.A.), dated Feb. 23, 1950, allowing in part an appeal from an order of WHITTAKER, J., dated June 24, 1949, on the trial of an action before a special jury.

On Jan. 18, 1949, between 11 p.m. and midnight, the appellant and her husband were crossing a road when a street-car driven by a motorman employed by the respondent company, which had stopped some seventy-five feet away to pick up passengers, re-started without warning and knocked down and killed the appellant's husband. At the time the road surface was slippery from ice and the appellant and her husband could only cross the road slowly. The area was well lighted. The appellant claimed that her husband's death was due to the negligence of the motorman for which the respondent company was responsible, and the jury so found, awarding the plaintiff $35,000 damages. In their defence the respondent company pleaded contributory negligence by the appellant's husband, but the jury found that there had been no such negligence. On appeal by the company, the Court of Appeal reduced the damages to $12,000.

June 20. VISCOUNT SIMON, in delivering the judgment of the Board, stated the facts and continued: Their Lordships consider that there would be no ground for reversing the jury's finding on the question of contributory negligence or for ordering a new trial unless the summing-up misled the jury. As to this, the passage in the learned judge's charge which is complained of was as follows:

"Before you can find that Nance was guilty of contributory negligence, you must find that he owed a duty to the defendant, and that he committed a breach of that duty, and was, therefore, negligent. The onus of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, and that must be proved by a preponderance of evidence which you are prepared to accept."

The three judges of the Court of Appeal were unanimously of the view that the judgment below could not stand, but for widely different reasons. SLOAN, C.J., held that the passage just quoted from the summing-up was a misleading and inaccurate exposition of the obligations of the deceased. In his view, the deceased owed no "duty" to the respondent company, but was subject to an imperative obligation to exercise reasonable care for his own safety. As the jury was not so instructed, the Chief Justice held that there was misdirection which had occasioned a miscarriage of justice, and that the verdict of the jury and the judgment entered thereon must be set aside. The learned Chief Justice then substituted the judgment which he considered ought to have been given, viz., that the deceased was at fault in not keeping a proper look-out for the approaching street-car. He said:

"Had he taken the precaution of a momentary glance, he would not have walked into a position of imminent peril."

F

On this, their Lordships would respectfully observe that, in their opinion, there was no evidence that the deceased did not look, and that, if he looked, it may be that he saw that the street-car was stationary. A person crossing the road in such circumstances cannot reasonably be expected to "keep his eye" continuously on a street-car, for he has to look after his own steps on the slippery surface, and the Chief Justice only postulates a "momentary glance." As for damages, the Chief Justice's view was that the damages awarded by the jury were excessive and $20,000 would fairly represent the pecuniary loss suffered by Mrs. Nance and those she represents. He fixed the degree of fault of the motorman at sixty per cent. and that of the deceased at forty per cent., with the result that judgment should be entered for $12,000. O'HALLORAN, J.A., on the contrary, took the view that "the jury would have failed to act judicially if they had not reached the decision that the motorman was solely responsible for the collision." The learned judge met the criticism directed to WHITTAKER, J.'s summing-up by examining the pleadings, which he considered set up the breach of duty owed by the deceased to the respondent company as the only contributory negligence alleged and did not include an allegation of his carelessness apart from duty. In his view WHITTAKER, J.'s charge was entirely correct. He added

"the argument that in crossing the street the deceased owed no duty to the street-car to be careful is one which I have struggled unsuccessfully to appreciate."

In the result, O'HALLORAN, J.A., while holding the respondent company solely to blame, was of opinion that the $35,000 awarded as damages appeared to be "purely arbitrary and without foundation in the evidence" and was in favour of directing a new trial to decide the proper quantum. SIDNEY SMITH, J.A., also took the view that there was no contributory negligence by the deceased. A He said:

"the assumption that the deceased did not see the car at all is against the evidence . . . but he was then so far advanced in the intersection that he was entitled to assume the car would give way to him."

This learned judge was not prepared to accept the view that a pedestrian crossing a street owes to approaching traffic the duty to be careful, for he said: B

"a pedestrian carries no menace and, since a pedestrian is practically incapable of causing damage to a vehicle by a collision, only damage to him need be considered."

Their Lordships, as will appear hereafter, must not be understood to agree with this proposition. The learned judge consequently held that there was clear misdirection, but at the same time he held that the respondent company had disabled itself from taking the point since at the end of the summing-up WHITTAKER, J., had inquired of counsel whether there was any objection to his charge and counsel then appearing for the defendants had replied that it was "entirely fair." Their Lordships find themselves relieved from pronouncing on this view of the matter, which was apparently not shared by the other two judges of the Court of Appeal. SIDNEY SMITH, J.A., however, considered that the award of damages was excessive and thought that a figure of more than $12,000 could not be justified. With this conflict of judicial opinion before them their Lordships must now deal with the objection to the summing-up and consider whether the conclusion reached by the jury was affected by any mistake in it. C

The statement that, when negligence is alleged as the basis of an actionable wrong, a necessary ingredient in the conception is the existence of a duty owed by the defendants to the plaintiff to take due care, is, of course, indubitably correct. But when contributory negligence is set up as a defence, its existence does not depend on any duty owed by the injured party to the party sued and all that is necessary to establish such a defence is to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the injured party did not in his own interest take reasonable care of himself and contributed, by this want of care, to his own injury. For when contributory negligence is set up as a shield against the obligation to satisfy the whole of the plaintiff's claim, the principle involved is that, where a man is part author of his own injury, he cannot call on the other party to compensate him in full. This view of the matter has recently been expounded, after full analysis of the legal concepts involved and careful examination of the authorities, by the English Court of Appeal in Davies v. Swan Motor Co. (Swansea), Ltd. (1) to which the Chief Justice referred. This, however, is not to say that in all cases the plaintiff who is guilty of contributory negligence owes to the defendant no duty to act carefully. Indeed, it would appear to their Lordships that in cases relating to running-down accidents like the present such a duty exists. The proposition can be put even more broadly. Generally speaking, when two parties are so moving in relation to one another as to involve risk of collision, each owes to the other a duty to move with due care, and this is true whether they are both in control of vehicles, or both proceeding on foot, or whether one is on foot and the other controlling a moving vehicle. If it were not so, the individual on foot could never be sued by the owner of the vehicle for damage caused by his want of care in crossing the road, for he would owe to the plaintiff no duty to take care. Yet such instances may easily occur, e.g., if the individual's rashness causes D E F G H the vehicle to pull up so suddenly as to damage its mechanism, or as to result in following traffic running into it from behind, or, indeed, in physical damage to the vehicle itself by contact with the individual. When a man steps from the kerb into the roadway, he owes a duty to traffic which is approaching him with risk of collision to exercise due care, and if a sentence of the judgment of DENNING, L.J., in the Davies case (1), where he says ([1949] 1 All E.R. 631):

“When a man steps into the road he owes a duty to himself to take care for his own safety, but he does not owe to a motorist who is going at an excessive speed any duty to avoid being run down.”

is to be interpreted in a contrary sense, their Lordships cannot agree with it.

B

Their Lordships do not feel able to accept the view of O'HALLORAN, J.A., that the pleadings in this case debar the respondent company from objecting that the passage complained of in the charge of WHITTAKER, J., is wrong in law. The plea that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence is wide enough to cover the contention that he was careless of his own safety, even though he did not owe a duty to the respondent company to be careful. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that the phrase “contributory negligence” uses the word “negligence” in a sense somewhat different from that which the latter word would bear when negligence is the cause of action. It may be pointed out that in the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, of the United Kingdom Parliament the contrast between the two meanings is recognised, for that Act, which provides for a sharing of responsibility for damage where a person suffers damage as a result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, defines “fault” by s. 4 as “... negligence, breach of statutory duty or other act or omission which gives rise to a liability in tort or would, apart from this Act, give rise to the defence of contributory negligence.”

The Contributory Negligence Act, 1936, of British Columbia, which was passed before the United Kingdom Act, does not contain a definition of “fault,” but there is no doubt that in British Columbia the conception of contributory negligence, which is part of the common law, is the same as in this country. Such a plea should be treated as setting up want of care by the plaintiff for his own safety, whether in the circumstances of the accident the plaintiff owed a duty to the defendant or not.

F

With the above considerations in mind, both as to the facts and as to the law, their Lordships have carefully considered whether the impugned passage in the summing-up of the trial judge should be regarded as vitiating the conclusion of the jury. To decide this question, it is necessary to have regard to the summing-up as a whole. The misdirection occurs early in the judge's charge and it is followed by a full and careful survey of the evidence to which no objection can be taken and which placed the essential issues before the jury very clearly. Moreover, the question put at the end of the summing-up to the jury on contributory negligence is correctly framed and contains no suggestion that the defence would be incomplete unless “duty” is proved to the jury's satisfaction. Their Lordships have come to the conclusion, after weighing these various elements, that the error complained of did not mislead the jury and the verdict that the respondent company was solely to blame should stand.

H

[HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the facts relating to the quantum of damages and concluded:] Their Lordships are satisfied that a jury could not reasonably have computed the total recoverable damages at a figure exceeding $22,500. This figure, in their view, falls short of the $35,000 award by a margin wide enough to justify the British Columbia Court of Appeal in rejecting the jury's figure. In that case a new trial on damages could be ordered, but the parties through their counsel have expressed their preference for the determination of the figure for damages on the advice of this Board. Their Lordships, accordingly, will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be allowed, and the sum of $12,000 awarded as damages by the Court of Appeal should be increased to $22,500. The cross-appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal allowed. Cross-appeal dismissed.

STEYNING AND LITTLEHAMPTON BUILDING SOCIETY v. WILSON.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), July 6, 1951.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Mortgage—Attornment clause—Notice to quit—Validity—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 2 (1), s. 23 (1).

Mortgage—Attornment clause—Creation of relationship of landlord and tenant—Notice to quit—Validity—Application of Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 2 (1), s. 23 (1).

A mortgage, dated June 8, 1948, of property comprising market gardens and nursery grounds provided: "The [mortgagor] hereby attorns tenant to the [mortgagee] of the property at the yearly rent of 6d. if demanded provided that the [mortgagee] may at any time after the last Thursday in July next by giving to the [mortgagor] . . . at least three days' notice in writing of the intention of the [mortgagee] so to do determine the tenancy hereby created and enter upon the property but so that the said tenancy shall not render the [mortgagee] liable to account to any person as mortgagee in possession." On Oct. 26, 1950, the mortgagee gave written notice to the mortgagor determining the tenancy created by the attornment clause on Oct. 31, 1950, but the mortgagor contended that, the property being agricultural land, the notice was ineffective by reason of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 2 (1) and s. 23 (1).

HELD: the attornment clause did not have the effect of creating an agricultural tenancy for the purpose of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, which applied only to true transactions between landlord and tenant in respect of agricultural holdings (viz., tenancies created for the purpose of farming the land), and not to an artificial tenancy created by an attornment clause in a mortgage deed, and, therefore, the notice to quit was not ineffective by reason of s. 2 (1) and s. 23 (1) of the Act.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The plaintiffs, Steyning and Littlehampton Building Society, as mortgagees issued an originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, claiming possession of the mortgaged property from the defendant, the mortgagor. The mortgage contained an attornment clause whereby the tenancy created by the clause could be determined by the society by three days' notice to the mortgagor. This notice had been given, but the mortgagor contended that, as the property was agricultural land, the notice was ineffective by reason of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 23 (1). The master made an order for possession subject to the decision of the judge on the point of law raised by the mortgagor's contention.

A Dunbar for the building society.
J. L. Arnold for the mortgagor.

B DANCKWERTS, J.: By an originating summons in the usual form, a mortgagee seeks to enforce his mortgage against the mortgagor by an order for delivery up of possession of the mortgaged property. The case illustrates again the undesirability of retaining in mortgages an attornment clause which is entirely obsolete, and, at the present time, serves no useful purpose. The mortgagor obtained an advance of £4,500 from the mortgagee, the Steyning and Littlehampton Building Society, and secured it by a mortgage, in the form commonly used by building societies, dated June 8, 1948. The deed contains the usual clauses for payment of the principal sum and interest by instalments and a charge by the mortgagor by way of legal mortgage of the property therein mentioned. The property in the present case consists of market gardens and nursery grounds, and is, therefore, of an agricultural nature. In cl. 3 (2) there is a provision requiring the mortgagor to repair the property. Clause 5 enables the society, if it expends money in repairs, to add the amount thereby expended to the security with interest. Clause 8 is in these terms:

D "The borrower hereby attorns tenant to the society of the property at the yearly rent of 6d. if demanded provided that the society may at any time after the last Thursday in July next by giving to the borrower or leaving upon the property at least three days' notice in writing of the intention of the society so to do determine the tenancy hereby created and enter upon the property but so that the said tenancy shall not render the society liable to account to any person as mortgagee in possession."

E The society has obtained from the master an order for possession in exercise of the learned master's discretion, subject only to the point of law in respect of which the case has been adjourned to me. The point of law is this. Counsel for the mortgagor contends that the attempt which was made by the society, by a letter dated Oct. 26, 1950, to determine the tenancy, created by cl. 8 of the mortgage, on Oct. 31, 1950, was ineffective by reason of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 23 (1), and, therefore, the tenancy still continues. Section 23 (1) provides:

G "A notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding shall (notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in the contract of tenancy of the holding) be invalid if it purports to terminate the tenancy before the expiration of twelve months from the end of the then current year of tenancy . . ."

H That sub-section, at first sight, does not seem to apply to a tenancy at will, but counsel for the mortgagor contends that it does so apply by reason of s. 2 (1) of the Act, which provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this section, where under an agreement made on or after Mar. 1, 1948, any land is let to a person for use as agricultural land for an interest less than a tenancy from year to year, or a person is granted a licence to occupy land for use as agricultural land, and the circumstances are such that if his interest were a tenancy from year to year he would in respect of that land be the tenant of an agricultural holding, then, unless the letting or grant was approved by the Minister before the agreement was entered into, the agreement shall take effect, with the necessary modifications, as if it were an agreement for the letting of the land for a tenancy from year to year . . ."

Counsel for the mortgagor submits that a tenancy at will is less than a tenancy from year to year, and so, by virtue of s. 2 (1), assuming that the provisions of the Act otherwise apply, the tenancy shall take effect, with the necessary modifications, as if it were an agreement for the letting of the land for a tenancy from year to year, and, therefore, s. 23 (1) applies and restricts the giving of notice to quit.

Section 1 (1) of the Act contains the meaning of "agricultural holding." Section 1 provides:

"(1) In this Act the expression 'agricultural holding' means the aggregate of the agricultural land comprised in a contract of tenancy, not being a contract under which the said land is let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment or employment held under the landlord. (2) For the purposes of this and the next following section, the expression 'agricultural land' means land used for agriculture which is so used for the purposes of a trade or business and includes any other land which, by virtue of a designation of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries (hereafter in this Act referred to as 'the Minister') under s. 109 (1) of the Agriculture Act, 1947, is agricultural land within the meaning of that Act."

By s. 94 (1), which is the definition section of the Act:

"'agricultural holding' has the meaning assigned to it by s. 1 of this Act . . . 'agriculture' includes horticulture, fruit growing, seed growing, dairy farming and livestock breeding and keeping, the use of land as grazing land, meadow land, osier land, market gardens and nursery grounds . . ."

Section 94 (1) contains a definition of "contract of tenancy" which I do not think I need read. "Landlord" is defined as meaning "any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any land," and "tenant" as meaning "the holder of land under a contract of tenancy" and as including the executors and other persons deriving title from a tenant.

A somewhat similar point was considered by me in Portman Building Society v. Young (1), where I held that, in the case of an attornment clause in another building society mortgage, the relationship of landlord and tenant was created so that the rights of the landlord to obtain possession, even though the tenancy had been determined, were subject to the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The attornment clause in that case was different in certain respects from the present clause, and was in these terms:

"The mortgagor hereby attorns tenant to the society of such parts of the property as may at any time be in the occupation of the mortgagor at the monthly rent of £9 16s. to be paid on the days hereinbefore appointed for payment of monthly instalments and such rent is to be applied in or towards satisfaction of such instalments. Provided always that the society may at any time without giving previous notice in that behalf determine the tenancy created by such attornment."

In that case no notice had been given and it was the issue of the summons by the building society which determined the tenancy before the date when the matter came before me. On an appeal by the building society, the Court of Appeal took the view that the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, which I thought applied notwithstanding the argument that they had no application to mortgage transactions, did not apply because the relationship created by the attornment had come to an end. SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 194):

“Once the contractual situation created by the attornment clause is gone, it is impossible with any sense of the meaning of words to refer to [the] relationship [of the parties] as that of landlord and tenant.”

A On that ground the Court of Appeal decided that there was no relationship of landlord and tenant and that the Rent Restrictions Acts had no application. I feel somewhat puzzled by the decision because one cannot help noticing that in many cases in which the Rent Restrictions Acts are applied the contractual relationship of landlord and tenant has gone, either by the expiration of the term of the tenancy, or by the giving of notice to quit, or for some other reason, and the tenant is protected by the provisions of those Acts, which create what is sometimes called a statutory tenancy. It is clear that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Portman Building Society v. Young (1) was based entirely on the view that, when the matter came before the court, there was no relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties. The present case is not one in which protection would be given by the relevant Act to a person who ceased to be a tenant, but it is argued by counsel for the mortgagor that the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, impose certain restrictions on the giving of notices to determine tenancies so that, if those restrictions are not complied with, the notice to quit and the attempt to determine the tenancy is ineffective.

D The argument for the society in the present case is similar to the other argument which was put up by the building society in Portman Building Society v. Young (1), viz., that the situation between mortgagor and mortgagee was not such as was contemplated by the legislation which was alleged to restrict the mortgagee's right to possession. That argument is noticed by SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., ([1951] 1 All E.R. 192) in Portman Building Society v. Young (1), but the court expressed no opinion on it, and, therefore, E I am left to consider, without any real assistance from that decision, whether the argument is an effective one in the present case. In the Portman Building Society case (1) SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., after referring to the argument that the Rent Acts applied, said (ibid., 192):

F “I confess that at first sight it seemed a strange case for the invocation of the Acts. It did not look as though it was the sort of case Parliament desired to protect in this way. Still, the mortgagees, for their own purposes, and to give themselves certain procedural advantages, had thought fit to insert this attornment clause, and it might be said that they must take the rough with the smooth and must prove what was necessary to bring their case within the class in which an order for possession under the Acts can be made, though, being mortgagees, they would almost inevitably have to sue in the High Court where they would be deprived of costs. The question whether or not an attornment clause in general does create what G SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., called a real tenancy between a real landlord and a real tenant is one which might be perceptible of a good deal of argument. In the days when Ex p. Isherwood. Re Knight (2) came before this court, a mortgage commonly took the form of a conveyance of the fee simple so that at law the mortgagee was the owner of the property and the mortgagor his tenant at will. The position in equity was superimposed, and, in fact, controlled the relationship, but, as I have said, in those days the mortgagee became the owner at law, and, that being so, it was, perhaps, somewhat easier to say that in reality a position of H landlord and tenant was created by putting the attornment clause in the mortgage deed. Under modern conveyancing practice, the mortgagee does not become the legal owner. He becomes a chargee. He may become a lessee under a term of years, but he does not become the owner. The mortgagor remains at law, as well as in equity, the owner subject to the charge and otherwise to the provisions of the mortgage deed. I do not think it necessary to pursue that aspect of the case further, nor do I think it necessary (and, indeed, on this we have heard no argument) to decide whether, having regard to the terms of the attornment clause and the uncertainty which, it is said, surrounds the description of the parcels, it would be right to say that no tenancy in the true sense of the term ever came into existence."

The reference to uncertainty in that case was a reference to the fact that the attornment there was of such part of the mortgaged property as might at any time be in the occupation of the mortgagor. In the present case there is no doubt that the attornment refers to the whole of the property and, consequently, the question of uncertainty does not arise.

There remains the argument of counsel for the society in the case now before me that, however ingeniously counsel for the mortgagor may have applied the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, to the situation created by the attornment clause, the matter is not really a true contract of tenancy, but is only a lending and borrowing transaction, and, therefore, not within the intention of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, or the Agriculture Act, 1947, which contains elaborate provisions for securing good management on the part of the landowners and good husbandry by the tenants of agricultural land. It seems to me that Ex p. Isherwood. Re Knight (2) does not assist the argument of counsel for the society, but does, in a sense, assist that of counsel for the mortgagor, because, although SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said a good deal about there being, not a real tenancy, but the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee in that case, what he said was for the purpose of the exercise by the court of a discretion under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the Bankruptcy Rules, 1871, in regard to the terms to be imposed on the trustee in bankruptcy in disclaiming a leasehold interest of a bankrupt, and SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., was not, as it seems, saying that, by reason of it not being a true landlord and tenant case, the disclaimer provisions in the statutory provisions relating to bankruptcy had no application. Therefore, to that extent, it may be said that Ex p. Isherwood. Re Knight (2) supports the argument which counsel for the mortgagor seeks to apply in the present case. On the other hand, it seems to me that, if an attornment clause of this kind is to invoke the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and the Agriculture Act, 1947, and if those provisions are also to be applied to the artificial term of years created either expressly in the mortgage or by implication under s. 85 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, extremely odd results will occur, and the situation requiring the application of elaborate provisions in the Act of 1948 and the Act of 1947 will be an extraordinarily unreal one. It seems to me that those Acts cannot have been intended to apply to anything other than true transactions between landlord and tenant in respect of agricultural holdings. The tenancy agreements subject to the Acts are the tenancies created for the purpose of farming the land, and not the artificial tenancies created either under s. 85 (2) of the Act of 1925 or by an attornment clause in a mortgage deed for the purpose of providing a security to a mortgagee.

In the present case, I am supported in that conclusion by the form of the attornment clause. I took a different view in Portman Building Society v. Young (1), but in that case there was a rent in the attornment clause of a real money value, and for that reason I considered that the case came within the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts. In the present case, the tenancy, such as it is, created by the attornment clause in cl. 8 of the mortgage, is at a yearly rent of 6d., if demanded. It seems to me that it would be disregarding the true nature of the transaction and applying in a highly artificial manner the provisions of a statute passed for a very different purpose, if I were to hold that that attornment clause had the effect of creating an agricultural tenancy for the purpose of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, which could only be terminated on notice in accordance with the very restrictive provisions contained in that statute for the benefit of the farming community. Accordingly, I hold that the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, does not apply here.

Declaration accordingly.

NOVELLO AND CO., LTD. v. HINRICHSEN EDITION, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Birkett, L.JJ.), June 21, 27, 28, 29, 1951.]

Copyright—Emergency legislation—Power of comptroller to grant to non-enemy subject licence to exercise copyright owned by enemy—Right of owner, after shedding enemy character, to exercise copyright subject to rights of statutory licensee—Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939 (c. 107), s. 2 (1).

On Feb. 19, 1940, the plaintiffs obtained from the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs and Trade Marks, under the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939, s. 2 (1), a non-exclusive licence in respect of the copyright of a musical work published by the firm of C. F. Peters, the owner of the firm and of the copyright being, at that time, H.H., an enemy subject within the meaning of the Act, who died in Belgium in 1942, the executor named in his will having pre-deceased him. On June 1, 1948, the plaintiffs obtained a similar licence in respect of another musical work published by C. F. Peters. On Mar. 2, 1949, M.H., who was at all material times a British subject by naturalisation, obtained letters of administration with the will annexed of the estate of his father, H.H. In an action by the plaintiffs against H. Edition, Ltd. and M.H., alleging infringement of copyright in respect of these works, the defendants contended, inter alia, that, as H. Edition, Ltd., had done the acts complained of as the licensee of M.H., in whom the copyright in the works was now vested, there was no infringement of the plaintiffs' licences by either of the defendants.

HELD: on the true construction of the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939, owners of copyrights to which the Act referred were still free to exercise their rights, subject to the restrictions imposed by the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, unless and until a licence affecting them was granted by the comptroller; under s. 2 (4) of the Copyright Act a licence, when granted, ousted any exercise of the owner's right which would be inconsistent with the terms of the licence, and, to the same extent, it overrode any licence previously granted by the owner, and, therefore, when a licence was granted under the Act its terms had to be looked at to see how far the owner's rights were restricted; as the statutory licences granted to the plaintiffs under s. 2 (1) were non-exclusives there was nothing to prevent M.H., the present owner of the copyright, (and a non-enemy subject), from exercising the copyrights or granting non-exclusive licences in respect of them, and, therefore, there was no infringement by either of the defendants of the licences granted to the plaintiffs.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: As, in the circumstances, the question whether the comptroller had jurisdiction to make the order of June 1, 1948, would not affect the result of the appeal, the court would not express a concluded opinion on the point, but, having regard to the view expressed by MORTON, J., in Re I. G. Farbenindustrie Akt.'s Agreement ([1940] 4 All E.R. 490, and 58 R.P.C. 54), it was not certain that the view expressed by WYNN-PARRY, J., on this matter was well founded. The point should, therefore, be left open for the judge of first instance, when a similar question came before the courts, to take his own independent view and not to feel himself bound either by the view of WYNN-PARRY, J., or that of MORTON, J.

Decision of WYNN-PARRY, J. ([1951] 1 All E.R. 779), affirmed.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Feb. 21, 1951, and reported [1951] 1 All E.R. 779, dismissing an action for alleged infringement of copyright.

The plaintiffs, who were music publishers, claimed inter alia an injunction to restrain the defendants, Hinrichsen Edition, Ltd., and Max Hinrichsen, from producing, or reproducing, or selling, or offering for sale by way of trade, or distributing for the purposes of trade, certain musical works in respect of which the plaintiffs held licences dated Feb. 19, 1940, and June 1, 1948, granted to them by the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs and Trade Marks, under the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939, s. 2. The defendants admitted the acts which were alleged to constitute infringement, but denied infringement, contending that the copyright in the works in the United Kingdom was vested in the second defendant as administrator of the will annexed of his father, Henri Hinrichsen, who was the former owner of the copyrights, and who had died in Belgium in 1942, and that the defendant company had done the acts complained of as the licensee of the second defendant, who was at all material times a British subject by naturalisation.

WYNN-PARRY, J., held inter alia (a) that the claim of Max Hinrichsen to have succeeded to the copyrights formerly owned by his father was well founded; (b) that the comptroller had no jurisdiction to grant the licence of June 1, 1948; and (c) that there was nothing in the language of the Act of 1939 to prevent the owner of a copyright who had shed his character of an enemy from exercising his copyright subject to any licences granted by the comptroller, and, therefore, as the licences granted to the plaintiffs were non-exclusive, Max Hinrichsen, as the present owner of the copyright of the works in question was entitled to permit the exercise of that copyright by the defendant company, provided that the plaintiffs' statutory licences were not prejudiced so long as they continued to exist. The plaintiffs appealed from the decision of the learned judge on the last two points.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and Aldous for the plaintiffs.

S. Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and F. E. Skone James for the defendants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This is an appeal from a decision of WYNN-PARRY, J., in an action brought by the plaintiffs for infringement of certain copyrights. The nature of the claim is set out with commendable brevity in the statement of claim and is founded on two orders made by the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs and Trade Marks pursuant to powers which, it is said, were duly vested in him under the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939. The first of the two orders was dated Feb. 19, 1940, and related to a piece of music known as "Rustle of Spring" by Sinding, and the second order was made on June 1, 1948, relating
